J. G. TOMLIN, Chairman,
Boone Co. Rep. Ex. Committee.
G. G. HUGHES, Sec'y.

Very fine growing weather all last week.

A small crowd attended court last Monday.

Oats are selling at 30 cents a bushel, put in the bin.

Some localities got considerable more rain than others last week.

The sign for planting fall and winter advertisements in the columns of the RECORDER is right.

The Zellers string band went to Erlanger, Saturday, where it made music for a big colored picnic.

The Boones go to Walton next Saturday to play the team at that place. A snappy game is anticipated.

Lawrenceburg fair always brings cloudy weather and rain if there is any in the country to draw from.

Considerable injury to the corn is said to have resulted from the hard wind on the night of the 5th inst.

The Erlanger and Boone teams played here last Saturday afternoon. Score 6 to 3 in favor of the Boones.

The teachers had possession of the local temple of justice, last week; this week the litigants are holding forth there.

In another column will be found the program for the fourth annual convention of the Christian churches of Boone county.

Very few of the people in this part of the county attended the Lawrenceburg fair, last week. The weather was too uncertain.

Just keep in mind the date of that big sale of real estate and personal property belonging to the estate of J. J. Lillard, deceased.

The first homegrown watermelons appeared in the Burlington market, last week. They were from the patch of Bernard Rogers, above Bellevue.

Patrons of the Erlanger public school are demanding a new and more modern school building, and a town of Erlanger's pretentions ought to have it.

The recent rains have been of great benefit to the second edition of gardens that the truckers had plaided only a few days before the threatened dry spell was interrupted.

The graduation exercises, last Thursday afternoon, brought quite a large crowd of people to town. The young lady graduates will never look handsomer and more winsome than they did on that occasion.

Those who have kept tab say that there has not been a run of coal in the Ohio river during the month of August since 1875, when the river was so high that it did a vast amount of damage to crops on the low bottoms.

The literary and musical entertainment on Thursday night of last week, at the court house was of a very high order and enjoyed by all who attended. The program consisted of lectures, recitations and piano solos.

At the regular term of the Boone county court, held on the first Monday in this month, W. H. Rice qualified as police judge of the town of Florence, to fill the vacancy in the office occasioned by the resignation of D. H. Brown.

Those who have qualified themselves to accept the RECORDER'S offer of the American Farmer, are Mrs. John Morris, of Erlanger; E. L. Grant, Mrs. Belle Clore, Nat Rogers and H. P. Parsons, of Bellevue; and Joseph Case, of Burlington.

The teachers having had their annual exchange of ideas, should feel refreshed, and enter upon the discharge of their duties this fall with renewed energy and determination to make their work a testimonial to their industry and efficiency.

The RECORDER would like to ascertain how much grain was produced in Boone county, this year, and with that in view it requests each owner of a threshing machine to report to it at the conclusion of the season the number of bushels of each kind his machine threshed.

WALTON vs BOONES
at Walton, Ky.,
SATURDAY, AUG. 19th, '05.
Game called at 2:30 o'clock p. m.

Has McInerneyed to Some Extent Himself.

LUDLOW, Ky., Aug. 14, 1905.

To the Editor of the Recorder:

I see in an evening paper that the new Democratic Boss of the Sixth Congressional District, was in Covington to try to adjust matters pertaining to the primary held in this county on the 5th inst. We would warn all good Democrats to stay away from Kenton county for fear they may become contaminated. We selected five honest men to conduct an honest primary and you see the result. If the Recording Angel was to come down here to conduct an honest election they would steal it from him and then crop his wings to keep him from reporting it. There has been very few honest elections held in Ludlow in the last fifteen years—even the election officers will boast about how they fixed up the returns to elect certain candidates.

"The Sixth District Boss wants Bob Jameson to withdraw his demand for a recount for harmony sake." There is no harmony in the Democratic party in Kenton county and never will be as long as it is under the present management. If Bob Jameson does back down we will have a Republican County Clerk for another four years, and a good chance to elect the whole Republican ticket in November.

If McInerny is the candidate for County Clerk, he cannot blame Democrats for voting against him. Four years ago when he was a candidate for Sheriff on the Democratic ticket he worked for the Republican candidates against Joe Rhinock and Bob Jameson. I heard a prominent Republican say that he furnished McInerny money, four years ago, to work for the Republican ticket, and if it had not been for McInerny bolting his own ticket the whole Democratic ticket would have been elected.

If the Sixth District Boss has guaranteed the votes of the district to Judge Paynter for U. S. Senator he had better be making peace with the Kenton county Republican candidates for the legislature.

I have always been a Democrat and voted that ticket until the last few years, but like many others, in Kenton county, have been driven out of the party by fraudulent elections.

When Gov. Goebel died Bud McInerny shed crocadile tears and set in sack-cloth and ashes until the next election for State Senator, when he for got that he ever had a friend by the name of Goebel, and started out to elect a Republican who was a particular friend of W. S. Taylor, and did elect him to take Goebel's place in the Senate, and McInerny is now asking Democrats to vote for him. These are facts and can be proven.

DEMOCRAT.

The editor of the Lawrenceburg, Indiana News, has discovered a tributary of the Ohio river, which drains a portion of North Carolina. He says: "The water in the Ohio river was red last week, something that many never saw before. It comes from a flood in some of the branches of New river, in North Carolina, where the soil is red."

With bumper corn and oats crops, not only in Boone county, but throughout the country, the price of provender for livestock ought not to demand the high prices that have prevailed for many years. With corn at 35 or 40 cents a bushel and oats 25 to 30 cents a bushel a person does not have to be a Rockefeller before he can afford to keep a cow and horse, and these are about the prices the two cereals are expected to command this fall.

William Wilson, lineman for the Boone County Telephone Company, got mixed up in a small explosion, last Thursday. Among other things in the wagon which he uses in his business were some small dynamite shells, one of which exploded, fragments from which cut a small gash in his forehead, on his chin, and a piece of the shell was driven into one of his hands. He was close to the shell at the time of the explosion, and thinks it came in contact with a wire on a telephone battery that was in the box. It is fortunate that Mr. Wilson received no worse injuries.

One day last week as Omer Porter, jr., was coming to town in a buggy, he picked up on the road a very nice looking young fellow, seemingly about 18 or 19 years old. He was well dressed, and claimed to have but recently returned from the Philippine Islands, where he soldiered. He said his name was King, and that he was absent from the army on a furlough, and was on his way to Glencoe, Gallatin county, where he had relatives. He said that a few nights before he was drugged in a saloon, over in Indiana, and a watch and a considerable amount of money were taken from him. Having received instructions as to the route and distance, the young man started on to Glencoe, but in a few days he returned to Burlington with Wesley Underhill, who lives about two miles south of town, and with whom he was stopping for a few days.

Is Frederick E. Carlton a Modern Bluebeard?

Many Women Claim Him as Their Wedded Husband.

HELD ON MANY SERIOUS CHARGES

Suspected of Poisoning Two Wives by Unique Methods to Collect Their Life Insurance —He Puzzles the Brooklyn Police Force.

New York.—Gaboriau, Poe or Conan Doyle might have thought of it for their heroes, but never in the world of real life before, it is safe to say, has a detective force found its strongest clew in the effort to prove a man one of the most remarkable criminals of the age in the simple art of brewing a cup of tea.

Yet to-day that may be called the principal connecting link by which they are hoping to obtain stronger evidence to show that Frederick E. Carlton, now a prisoner in Raymond street jail, Brooklyn, has been guilty several times over of murder, repeated grand larcenies, many bigamies, wholesale blackmail and swindling of insurance companies.

Their first cup of tea has been found almost at the time one James E. McCandless, a farm boy, left his home at Louisiana, Polk county, Mo., in the latter part of the eighties, and the last sees Mary Gorman Carlton dying 18 years later in a furnished room house in Sands street, Brooklyn, from tetanus. During those 18 years they have found tea brewed in half the states of the union, in 20 of its great cities, in the army and in the navy, and always in the same way. The tea, of course, is only the first step. The second is the confrontation, and that, the police promise, will be for the living.

Inspector Cross Puzzled.

Police Inspector Adam A. Cross, known as one of the most intelligent and best educated of the uniformed force, borough inspector of Brooklyn, after an hour and a half's searching cross-examination of Carlton the other day turned to the men waiting, and, with a smile that was not wholly that of triumph, pointed at the retreating figure of Carlton departing between two policemen, saying:

"There goes, in my opinion, one of the remarkable criminals of the age. I confess I cannot wholly make him out. A very high degree of cunning, a smattering of education along peculiar lines and a criminal instinct driven by an inordinate desire for notoriety have combined to produce a man who would stop at nothing, who could cover his tracks well for years and then when discovery did come supply him with the effrontery to stand undismayed before overwhelming evidence.

"I have just talked to him for an hour and a half. He declared to me he would answer frankly, and yet when questions were put to him that he did not care to have asked he would vail his frankness under refusal or the plea that his counsel had instructed him to keep silent. He laughs at all charges except perhaps frankness itself on some points, he had drawn a mental circle about others and his answers never overstepped the line—but through it all there was the laughing triumphant declaration: 'You will see. I will go free. There will never be a charge made to stand up against me. I am willing to go to jail and have everything sifted thoroughly. At the proper time I will tell everything.'"

Carlton has at the present time three definite charges against him. The first is the accusation of H. B. J. Schaub, machinist on the submarine Porpoise, that Carlton took from him the sum of $700 on a pretext that the money would be used in speculating in tax sales. On that he stands indicted.

The second charge for which he is under indictment in Manhattan is the accusation of Dr. G. A. Goldsmith, of Stamford, Conn., who has sworn that Carlton drugged him with a cup of tea and robbed him of $500 at the St. Clair hotel, Park Row, in January, 1900.

The third, for which he is accused jointly with Mrs. Eleanor Van Deventer, with whom he lived, is having in his possession improper photographs of women.

At present Dr. Charles P. O'Connor, pathologist of the health department, is conducting a chemical analysis of the stomach and organs of Mary Gorman Carlton, his wife, who died in March of this year, supposedly from tetanus, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the woman died from poison.

The authorities at Washington stand ready, it is reported, to exhume the body of Jennie Smyth Carlton, wife, who died in June, 1904, from tetanus, it was supposed, for the purpose of discovering if she died from the effects of poison.

Suspect Tetanus Inoculation.

In both of these cases the authorities are proceeding on the assumption that in applying modern scientific methods to murder, the man may have actually inoculated the women with the germs of tetanus. They have the testimony of two persons already in their possession that Carlton not only often spoke of germs, but apparently had cultures of them in his apartments. A motive for the murder easily proven, the police declare, would be found in the insurance he collected on the death of both wives.

Photographs of Carlton have been identified by Mrs. John E. McCandless, living in a small town in Nebraska, who declares that they were married in 1890, after which she was despoiled of her savings and deserted.

Mrs. Fred Carlton, of Yankton, S. D., has written to the police that she recognizes Carlton's portrait as that of pictures. These pictures are now in the possession of the police, and the statement of one Marie Brossman is to the effect that Carlton at one time threatened to transpose a negative of her head to the body of another woman. She has told the police that he hinted that by that means he had been able to accomplish much.

Inquiry from Chicago.

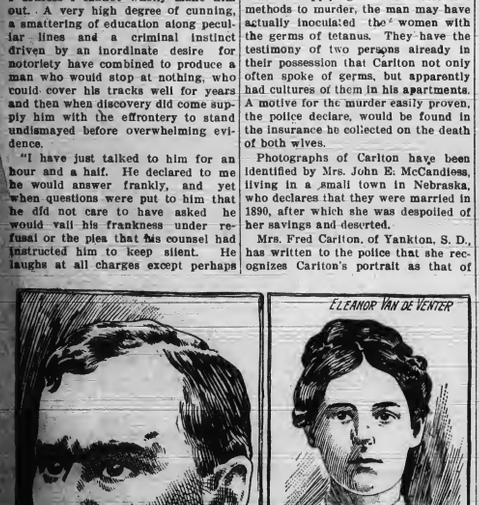
In addition to this there is the inquiry of the Chicago police, asking for more particulars about Carlton, declaring that a Carl Horton, who ran a matrimonial bureau at No. 155 Washington street, that city, several years ago, resembled Carlton's published pictures. That man was arrested, but was acquitted and left town.

It will be seen easily that except for the three crimes on which he now stands charged and the one which aiwaits the outcome of the chemit's analysis the testimony is not yet conclusive. The police have not yet gathered together all the strands of evidence, but in every allegation so far the cup of tea is found. St. Louis has sent word that Carlton is the young McCandless, of Polk county, who enlisted in the United States army at an early age, deserted and served two years' imprisonment in Fort Leavenworth, the military prison. It is there, it is asserted, that he learned to cook.

It is there, it is thought, he learned to brew a cup of tea by pouring hot water upon the tea leaves, upon which lay a slice of lemon. That is a common enough way nowadays in cities and abroad, but it is not the way they make tea in the country districts, where the old-fashioned boiling or steeping is still used. It was strange enough to have Helen Murray remember it of John E. Candless; for Jennie Andrews, of South Dakota, to use that as one of her means of identification, and for Lucia Mitchell, Mrs. Kettering, Rose Cerler, Mrs. Klingrey, the Peterson girl, the parents of Jennie Smyth Carlton, and the mother and brother of Mary Gorman, as well as the Mrs. Hattie Schultz and her bandmaster husband in Sands street, Brooklyn, where Carlton boarded, all of them refer to it.

Schaub, who has accused him of grand larceny, alleges that he was offered tea to drink. Dr. Goldsmith has sworn that the drug which De Martinez administered to him to produce unconsciousness was in a cup of tea. The McCandless of the army and the Carlton of the navy brewed the tea.

The foregoing is the arraignment by the police. There is something to be said for the man around whom so powerful a net is closing. Carlton himself can talk for himself and talk quietly, intelligently and logically; that is where there does not intervene a date or a place or a name he desires at this time to withhold.



A Dangerous Man.

"He is a dangerous man to have loose," is the way Inspector Cross puts it. "How many woman have fallen a prey to his greed and viciousness it would be hard to say. How he won the love and confidence of these women is beyond comprehension. He is a man of low, petty practices, a man of the meanest type. He fascinated innocent women and they were as toys in his hands."

Miss Marie Breslin, upon whom Carlton tried a unique scheme of blackmail by means of an obnoxious photograph, fell under Carlton's hypnotic eye.

"He asked me to marry him before his second wife was dead," says this pretty Brooklyn miss. "I was her bridesmaid, and I was shocked when he spoke to me. I felt myself under the strength to refuse him, but, thank God, I did. Then he told me he would get me by foul means, and I don't know what might have happened if he had not been arrested. I always hated him, but his influence over a woman was so strong that no one without a desperate effort could get away from him."

Carlton's feverish anxiety for feminine love has not deserted him since his incarceration at the Brooklyn jail. Mrs. Vandeventer, who was herself thrust into a cell when Anthony Comstock heard of her having posed for photographs found in Carlton's trunk, one, that of having improper photographs in his possession. He declares he has an ample defense to every other accusation, and yet he will not even waive the police the slightest assistance in arriving at the truth of any of the charges against him. He says he does not care how many come forward to accuse him, he knows that no matter how he will be able to [illegible] defiant.

[illegible] inspector had [illegible] men—reported [illegible] others—the man she married soon after the McCandless episode. She declares that she was robbed and deserted.

Mrs. James Martinez, of Covington, Ky., is positive that Carlton and the Martinez she married in the early nineties are one and the same person.

Mrs. Lulu Kettering, of Rochester, N. Y., now using her old name, was courted and wed in 1897 by one Eduardo de Roderiguez, self-styled Brazilian planter. They came to New York city immediately after the wedding and Mrs. Kettering swears she recognizes in Carlton the man who a few days later took all her money and jewelry, amounting to about $3,500, and deserted her.

Bigamy Charge Likely.

Rose Cerler, of St. Louis, has sent word that she recognizes in Carlton the Carl Mardin who married her, robbed her and deserted her in the same year.

Mrs. Etta Kingrey, of Gordon, Ala., is coming north to be satisfied that in Carlton she will be able to identify the Eduardo J. Martinez who married her in 1898 in Alabama, took all her savings and then deserted her. On this identification the police believe they will be able to base a charge of bigamy, for they claim to have outside evidence to show that in one particular case Carlton posed as De Martinez, claiming to have been a Spaniard spy and to have inside knowledge of the blowing up of the Maine.

Millie Peterson, of Jersey City, has positively identified Carlton in jail as the man who made her his common law wife and deserted her. She does not say Carlton ever robbed her, but she has sworn that he endeavored to have her life insured.

The charges of swindling the insurance companies, the police admit, are wholly without anything substantial on which to base suspicion at this time. There have been inquiries for further descriptions and identifications from at least five insurance companies and guarded statements that there was some suspicion that there might have been fraud in that way.

The charge of blackmail rests on the and who later gained temporary freedom through the kind offices of a bondsman, calls on him every day and they exchange most endearing confidences.

"I'll marry her when I get out," says Carlton. "She's the best friend I have in the world."

"I love Fred devotedly and I wouldn't marry anyone else if I had to wait years and years for him," avers Mrs. Vandeventer.

And as to this, Inspector Cross says he has occasion to believe that the loving couple are already married.

"A Funny Mix-Up."

"He tried to insure her life for $2,000 and they both swore they were married," says the inspector. "And her own brother-in-law told the insurance company, for which he was the agent, that they were married. Now, that's a funny mix-up."

In his checkered career Carlton has posed as a physician, chemist, expert photographer, priest, Presbyterian minister, expert chef and owner of a Brazilian coffee plantation. He has boasted of his keen knowledge of medicine, and has said he know how to cultivate enough germs to supply the borough of Brooklyn for the rest of its natural life.

Carlton has maintained a marvelous bravado since his arrest. It is a characteristic that is one of his strongest points. Nothing seems to nettle him, and he affects a good humor at all times that, with a man under such intense cross-fire, is hard to understand. Lack of nerve has never for a moment led him to a false step since his arrest. Confronted at Raymond street jail by Millie Peterson, a Jersey City woman whom he caught in his spidery web under promise of marriage, only to forsake her for another, he gazed coldly at her.

"For God's sake, don't say you don't know me," implored the heartbroken woman, whose life had been the torment of a thousand hells since he left her.

"I never saw you," declared Carlton, his eyes dropping to escape her tears.

She fainted, and on being revived her agonizing screams sent chills to the hearts of the callous prison guards.

Carlton gazed upon the creature before him unmoved.

"Fred, I love you. I don't want to prosecute you."

"Take her away. 'She's crazy," commanded Carlton.

WHAT TO DO IF CONSTIPATED

Summer—Bowel and Stomach Trouble

Q. What is the beginning of sickness?
A. Constipation.
Q. What is Constipation?
A. Failure of the bowels to carry off the waste matter which lies in the alimentary canal where it decays and poisons the entire system. Eventually the results are death under the name of some other disease. Note the deaths from typhoid fever and appendicitis, stomach and bowel trouble at the present time.
Q. What causes Constipation?
A. Neglect to respond to the call of Nature promptly. Lack of exercise. Excessive brain work. Mental emotion and improper diet.
Q. What are the results of neglected Constipation?
A. Constipation causes more suffering than any other disease. It causes rheumatism, colds, fevers, stomach, bowel, kidney, lung and heart troubles, etc. It is the one disease that starts all others. Indigestion, dyspepsia, diarrhea, loss of sleep and strength are its symptoms—piles, appendicitis, and fistula, are caused by Constipation. Its consequences are known to all physicians, but few sufferers realize their condition until it is too late. Women become confirmed invalids as a result of Constipation.
Q. Do physicians recognize this?
A. Yes. The first question your doctor asks you is "are you constipated?" That is the secret.
Q. Can it be cured?
A. Yes, with proper treatment. The common error is to resort to physics, such as pills, salts, mineral water, castor oil, injections, etc., every one of which is injurious. They weaken and increase the malady. You know this by your own experience.
Q. What then should be done to cure it?
A. Use the free coupon below at once. Mull's Grape Tonic will positively cure Constipation and in the shortest space of time. No other remedy has before been known to cure Constipation positively and permanently.
Q. What is Mull's Grape Tonic?
A. It is a Grape Compound that exerts a peculiar healing influence upon the intestines, strengthening the muscles of the alimentary canal so that they can do their work unaided. The process is gradual but sure. It is not a physic. It is unlike anything else you have ever used, but it cures Constipation, dysentery and bowel trouble. Having a rich, fruity grape flavor, it is pleasant to take. As a hot weather tonic it is unequaled insuring the system against diseases so fatal in hot weather.
Q. Where can Mull's Grape Tonic be had?
A. Your druggist sells it. The dollar bottle contains nearly three times the 50-cent size, but if you write to-day you will receive the first bottle free with instructions. This test will prove its worth.

CERTAINLY GRAND SAVING.

Unexpected Yet Eminently Satisfactory Result of a Trick on the Gas Meter.

Mr. Macpherson's gas bills were sore quarterly trials. "Man, they're simply exor-r-bitant," he remarked one day to his friend MacTaggart.

But MacTaggart was a man of resource, and suggested a remedy.

"Ye see, it's this way," he said. "In the gas meter there are a lot o' wee wheels which revolve as the gas passes through, and so cause the amount consumed to be registered. Noo, every nicht when ye gang to bed and turn oot the licht, ye maun just blaw doon the pipe, and the wee wheels will revolve in the opposite direction and subtract from the amount of gas ye've been using. Man, ye'll find it a grand saving."

Mr. Macpherson practiced the remedy for exorbitant gas bills religiously during a month.

Then came the gas inspector on his usual round. He examined the register, looked at the entry for the previous quarter, and then referred to his book. Again he looked from one to the other, and his air became one of the greatest perplexity.

"Whaur's the matter?" said Mr. Macpherson, who was standing by.

"Weel, Mr. Macpherson," said the gas inspector, "I dinna ken what's been happening to your gas meter, but I find the company owes ye exactly £1 15s 11d."

FIFTEEN YEARS OF TORTURE

Itching and Painful Sores Covered Head and Body—Cured in a Week by Cuticura.

"For fifteen years my scalp and forehead was one mass of scabs, and my body was covered with sores. Words cannot express how I suffered from the itching and pain. I tried many doctors and treatments, but could get no help, and had given up hope when a friend told me to get Cuticura. After bathing with Cuticura Soap and applying Cuticura Ointment for three days, my head was as clear as ever, and to my surprise and joy, one cake of soap and one box of ointment made a complete cure in one week. Thousands of Women

ARE MADE WELL AND STRONG

Success of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Rests Upon the Fact that It Really Does Make Sick Women Well

Thousands upon thousands of American women have been restored to health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Their letters are on file in Mrs. Pinkham's office, and prove this statement to be a fact and not a mere boast.

Overshadowing indeed is the success of this great medicine, and compared with it all other medicines and treatment for women are experiments.

Why has Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound accomplished its widespread results for good?

Why has it lived and thrived and done its glorious work for a quarter of a century?

Simply and surely because of its sterling worth. The reason no other medicine has even approached its success is plainly and positively because there is no other medicine in the world so good for women's ills.

The wonderful power of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound over the diseases of womankind is not because it is a stimulant—not because it is a palliative, but simply because it is the most wonderful tonic and reconstructor ever discovered to act directly upon the uterine system, positively curing disease and displacements and restoring health and vigor.

Marvelous cures are reported from all parts of the country by women who have been cured, trained nurses who have witnessed cures, and physicians who have recognized the virtue in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and are fair enough to give credit where it is due. If physicians dared to be frank and open, hundreds of them would acknowledge that they constantly prescribe Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in severe cases of female ills, as they know by experience that it will effect a cure.

Women who are troubled with painful or irregular menstruation, backache, bloating (or flatulence), leucorrhœa, falling, inflammation, or ulceration of the uterus, ovarian troubles, that "bearing-down" feeling, dizziness, faintness, indigestion, nervous prostration, or the blues, should take immediate action to ward off the serious consequences and be restored to health and strength by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Anyway, write to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., for advice. It's free and always helpful.

HANDY LIVE STOCK LOADER

How a Useful and Portable Loader May Be Built by the Farmer for Use on the Farm.

The illustration given herewith of the stock-loading truck shows a very useful and handy loader for farmers to use in loading hogs, sheep or cattle out of pens or yards. The bed pieces, as described by a correspondent in the Practical Farmer, are 2x6-inch scantling 11 feet long; crosspieces 2x4, 3 feet long, bolted on top of bed-pieces, one at each end. The upright pieces at front end are 2x4 inches 3 feet 6 inches high, center uprights 57 inches high and the rear ones 72 inches high, each being bolted to bed-piece, also to the 2x4 which supports the floor on either side. The front or lower ends of these pieces rest on the bed-pieces, while their rear ends are supported by a piece of 1¼x6-inch board nailed across the uprights 3 feet 6 inches above the bed-pieces. There is also a board nailed across to support the center. The floor is made of 2-inch plank with strips nailed across to prevent stock from slipping. Four 1x6 boards are nailed to each set of uprights and form the sides of the chute. The wheels should be from 12 to 14 inches in diameter; 1½-inch gas pipe would answer for the axle. The two levers, one on each side, should be 5 feet long, made similar to a pump handle, fastened by a bolt passing through the center of the middle uprights and a piece of iron 6 inches long bolted to the bed-pieces. Levers are fastened to axle by a bent iron bolted to under portion of lever about 11 inches from where bolt passes through end of lever. Two hooks are required in the bed-pieces for holding the levers down when wheeling the truck from one place to another in the farm yard.

SHEEP ENRICH THIN SPOTS

One Farmer's Experience in the Profitableness of the Flock of Sheep.

Sheep are not only conservers of fertility but distributors of it where most needed if given an opportunity. They are averse to water, seeking elevations for their resting place and the low land of the pasture for the succulent growth.

W. B. Loyd gives his experience in the Farm and Home as follows:

"I turned a flock of sheep into a clover field, and they at once sought out the spots where the clover did not catch and eagerly devoured the weeds or pigeon grass that had taken possession of the open spaces. Then they ate the weeds and succulent grass in low places and runs in the field, leaving the clover on the high land, where most needed to enrich the soil. After everything else in the field had been eaten, the sheep ate the clover blossoms and small portions of the plants, but left the bulk of the clover on the portions of the field where most needed."

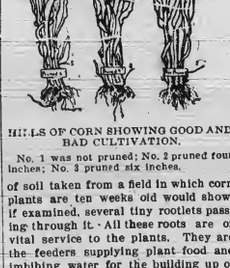
THE CULTIVATION OF CORN

Experiments to Show the Most Effective and Economical Methods.

That system of corn cultivation is most effective and economical which removes weeds, conserves moisture and aerates the soil, says DeWitt C. Wing, in "The Improvement of Corn," just issued as bulletin No. 133 by the Pennsylvania department of agriculture.

To prevent the evaporation of soil water, is undoubtedly the most important office of cultivation. After rains, if the soil is not stirred it bakes, cracks form and moisture escapes rapidly. If the soil is stirred as soon after rains as its condition permits the surface crust cannot form. Capillarity is destroyed by this operation, and instead of the moisture evaporating through the soil tubes it is retained for use by the thirsty plants. The absence of weeds, therefore, is no excuse for the abandonment of cultivation.



To prevent the formation of a hard, baked or crusted surface, which condition facilitates the escape of soil water, is the vital function of tillage.

Deep and shallow culture experiments, and the experience of all observant corn-growers who have given the subject of intelligent attention, indicate that for practically all soils adapted to corn surface cultivation best serves the purposes of tillage. Differences of from ten to twenty-five bushels per acre in favor of shallow culture as against deep plowing of corn are not uncommon in the corn belt, where the two systems of cultivation have been thoroughly tested and compared under average conditions.

Surface culture, which means that the implement used shall not disturb the soil to a greater depth (preferably less) than four inches below the surface, stirs the soil without pruning or injuring the foraging or feeding roots of the plants and, by forming a mulch on the surface, reduces very materially the evaporation of moisture.

While deep culture does not accelerate the evaporation of moisture, experiments show that if practiced with the same regularity as shallow tillage, it conserves as much soil water as the latter method; in nearly all cases the yield of corn grain from shallow-tilled fields have been appreciably in excess of those obtained under identical soil and climatic conditions from deep-plowed fields. The difference generally is attributed to the fact that deep culture injures the roots of the plants.

After the corn plants have attained a height of 18 inches or two feet the fields from near the first six or eight inches of the surface soil contain a network of roots. These roots are so numerous that nearly every square inch of soil taken from a field in which corn plants are ten weeks old would show, if examined, several tiny rootlets passing through it. All these roots are of vital service to the plants. They are the feeders supplying plant food and imbibing water for the building up of plant tissue. Most of these feeding rootlets grow comparatively near the surface, depending, however, upon the character of the soil.

Investigations have shown that the fourth inch of soil contains more corn roots than the three inches above it or the four inches below it. For this reason any implement which works the earth in their territory interferes with the nourishment of the plants. It prunes the roots and thus decreases the capacity of the plant to draw food and water from the soil. Fig. 3 shows the effect of root pruning on the plants composing the groups numbered 2 and 3. No. 1 represents plants which were not root-pruned, which is equivalent to saying that shallow cultivation was practiced. The yields made by the fields which the three groups of plants respectively represent were 62 bushels per acre for No. 1, 45 bushels for No. 2, which was pruned or cultivated four inches, and 30 bushels for No. 3, which was pruned or cultivated six inches deep. The more roots a plant has the greater its power to nourish itself. Any system of cultivation, therefore, which cuts off roots is to be avoided.

QUESTION OF THE TARIFF.

If the Dingley Schedule Continues in Force American Workmen Will Suffer.

The interest in the reciprocity convention which is to meet in Chicago is increasing. It increases because various classes of producers are learning that it will not be long before their sales in European countries, with the exception of the united kingdom, which pays no attention to Mr. Chamberlain's entreaties to break away from free trade, will be greatly reduced unless their government shall do something to protect them, says the Chicago Tribune. Manufactures of sewing machines, typewriters, electrical machinery, shoes and leather, the growers of breadstuffs and fruits, and the cattle raisers are beginning to appreciate the effect of European high tariffs.

It took the threat of a loss of Chinese trade to open the eyes of certain American manufacturers to the improper treatment of Chinese merchants and students by government officials. The inevitable loss of a large portion of the valuable trade with Germany, unless the rigor of the tariff which is to go into operation next spring shall be mitigated, is having a powerful effect on all who are interested in the preservation of that trade.

Austria-Hungary is expected to put in operation soon a new tariff which will be prohibitory as regards a number of American products now consumed there. Switzerland has a new tariff whose maximum duties will be imposed on American goods. Thus one European country after another is adopting the policy of the exclusion of American goods unless the United States will make concessions to them by abating here and there the extreme exclusiveness of the Dingley tariff act—an act which, whatever its merits may have been when it was enacted, does not fit existing conditions.

It was announced the other day from Oyster Bay that President Roosevelt had decided to call an extraordinary session of congress on November 11. It is to be called, according to one statement, to act on "some anti-rebate and other railroad legislation, and also for the consideration of tariff conditions." The reciprocity conference of next month, if it be as large and representative as it bids fair to be will provide for congress data which will enable it to understand the need of action for the preservation of American trade. The conference will also enlighten congress as to the feeling of producers in all parts of the country on the subject.

"What we produce beyond our domestic consumption," said President McKinley, "must find a vent abroad." If that vent be not found domestic production will be curtailed. There will be less employment and wages will be forced down. If congress shall adopt "the policy of good will and friendly trade relations" advocated by President McKinley all will go well. If the Dingley tariff shall not be modified in any particular for annoy, that tariff enacted to protect American wage workers and other producers will inflict incalculable injury upon them instead of protecting them.

JAIL FOR A MONOPOLIST.

Trust Promoter in Kansas Is Properly Treated by the Farmers.

Those strenuous Kansas farmers have a trust promoter in jail. He is secretary of the Grain Dealers' association, and was arrested in 1902 for forming a pool among the millers which the state law declares to be in restraint of trade as the United States anti-trust law does. His attorneys carried the case to the United States supreme court, and that court affirmed the decision of the lower courts. It thus appears to be only necessary to have the case for the people against the monopolists followed up and the people will win every time.

If the republican administration showed equal vigilance and strenuousity against the monopolists that the Kansas farmers have, there would also be some trust magnates in jail for disobeying the federal statute. But as President Roosevelt decided in the Santa Fe case that the corporation and not its officers must be proceeded against, the federal law is virtually a dead letter, for the corporation has no body, or soul, for that matter, to punish. If the Kansas farmers had proceeded against the Grain Dealers' association instead of it's officers, they could not have incarcerated that corporation, but the punishment of the chief official has had the effect of stopping monopoly in that part of Kansas and strengthened the hands of monopoly fighters all over the state.

Rush county in which this strenuous prosecution of monopolists occurred, is a democratic county and the democratic farmers are proud of the fact that the arrest and conviction occurred there, and are seeing to it that the prisoner obtains no favors.

——What are we coming to! One republican United States senator gets six months in jail, others are out on bail, another is proved a grafter and similar charges are pending against more of them.

——How proud the honest republicans of New York must be of their two United States senators, whose political reputation should be sent to the repair shop.

——A correspondent wants to know whether "the administration" is plural or singular. There is no fixed rule, but the present one is singular.—Washington Post.

——This republican trust era has other disadvantages besides high prices, it begets grafting and rascality in high places which seems to be increasing, where the g. o. g. is strongest.

From this collection may be learned all the details of the temples, palaces and convents of what has hitherto been a city of impenetrable mystery.

It is a unique occupation, requiring considerable skill, judgment and patience. The Neuperts have been engaged in the business for 40 years.

Bandit Bees.

At Weston-on-Trent, England, the other day a large swarm of strange bees arrived and attempted to drive the local bees out of their hives, but were repulsed. They then swarmed angrily into the village and attacked everybody they met. It was late in the day when they retired, leaving the village all swollen up.

The new sugar plant from South America, which has been named Eupatorium rebandium, is pronounced by Bertoni, the German chemist, to be of great industrial value. It grows eight or ten inches high, and is found to contain from 20 to 30 times as much saccharine matter as sugar cane or the beet.

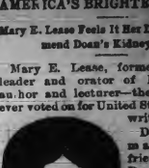
A GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY.

The President Signs Proclamation Giving Over a Million Acres of Utah Land to Home-Makers.

Another golden opportunity is offered the home-makers of America. It comes in the form of the opening for settlement of the lands of the Uintah Indian Reservation in Utah. This great reservation comprises 2,444,000 acres, of which 1,000,000 have been thrown open to settlement by the proclamation which President Roosevelt signed on July 15 of this year, and which takes effect on August 28.

The mode of procedure in making the allotment of these lands is similar to that adopted at the time of the opening of the Rosebud Indian reservation, in 1904, when the Chicago & North-Western Railway carried thousands of settlers into the trans-Missouri country to look for new homes. Settlers may make entry at the United States land offices at Grand Junction, Col., at Vernal, Utah, Price, Utah, or Provo, Utah.

Any citizen of the United States above the age of 21 years, or the head of a family, though younger, widows and deserted wives may register for a homestead. All applications must positively be made in person in registering at one of the U. S. land offices named, except in the case of honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, who may register through an agent.



The Uintah Reservation lies in the north-central portion of the state of Utah, in Uintah and Wasatch counties. It extends from the Green River on the east to Heber, county seat of Wasatch county, on the west, and to the crest of the great Uintah Mountain Range on the north, comprising land rich in agricultural and mineral possibilities. A large portion of this tract of land is remarkably fertile. The climate is temperate, with almost perpetual sunshine. The altitude is from 4000 to 6000 feet above the sea. In addition to the agricultural lands, there are also large quantities of grazing land on which cattle, sheep and horses may be raised with great success. The lands are watered by the Duchesne and Uintah rivers.

The passenger from the east can best reach the Reservation via the Chicago, Union Pacific & North-Western Line to Denver, which is 26 hour ride from Chicago, and the D. & R. G. or Colorado Midland from Denver. There is daily service from Mack to Dragon.

A man's house is his castle—and his creditor his king.

TUESDAY MORNING.

Institute called to order by the Superintendent.

Song, Devotional Exercises, conducted by Prof. Eubank, after which the subject of Spelling was resumed by Prof. Burton and Eubank. Prof. Gordon, of Eminence, Ky., an old ex-Boone teacher, was next introduced and gave a very creditable talk on the subject under discussion.

RECESS.

Prof. Burton's address on teaching reading to beginners, was well received. Miss Mary Rouse, Prof. Eubank and Prof. Gordon gave good talks on reading. Prof. Gordon's idea was to keep up the relish for literature and power of expression.

BATTLE AT CYNTHIANA.

I sprang to the fence and had thrown down three or four rails, when the Colonel said: "There, Lieutenant, that will do, thank you," and with his noble charger, (the gift of the regiment as an expression of the esteem and high regard they had for him), he cleared the fence and struck out for the opening and the pike. I ran across the corn field to a stone fence along a skirt of woods. The corn tassels were dropping around me, cut off by the enemy's bullets. It was a bad day for corn and a worse one for "blue coats." Just before I reached the fence I looked to see what had become of the Colonel. He had gained the pike and was going up the hill in full tilt with his hat in his hand waving defiance to the enemy, who were in hot pursuit, firing as they went. I leaped, or rather fell upon the stone fence to hear the old familiar command, "Halt!" There, looking into the business end of a carbine, with a man behind it, who had fire in his eye; being tired and hungry and not feeling very well anyhow, I couldn't think of a better thing to do just then than to halt, and halt I did, and I might have been halted right there yet if that man had stayed behind that gun. The monotony of this desperate moment was broken by my captor saying: "Well Yank, I have got you; give me the pistol out of that scabbard." I told him there was none in it. "Where is it?" he asked. I told him I had thrown it away, to which he replied: "Go and get it and be d—n quick about it." He leaped over the fence and followed me on his horse. I thought that I was doing real well to lead a cavalry man on foot, but evidently he did not think so. And if he knew that I was tired he did not care, for he urged me to greater speed until I could scarcely distinguish between the gait that I was going and a brisk run; and yet he urged me as if he thought a Yankee ought to fly. I was glad when I reached the spot and found my pistol where I had thrown it at the enemy as they came up the hill just before I left Col. Landram and the fence, and I never owned anything of such value that I was so anxious to give away ("bless the cheerful giver.") When my captor said: "Now go up there to those fellows"—meaning some of our boys that they had captured and were guarding—"and be quick about it." I managed to keep out from under their horses' feet. We were now gathered up here and there and marched down into town a sad looking procession and lined up in the court house yard to witness the sad spectacle of watching the brave boys in gray eat pie and cake while we wait, which were graciously distributed by the ladies of Cynthiana. Now we could have eaten a cake or two and a piece of one of those pies. The most that we needed was an opportunity which never came; but perhaps those ladies did not know that Yankee soldiers liked pie and cake, but that blessed little creature came tripping along the line with a pitcher of water, a smile of innocence, a blush of purity, and in answer to our anxious inquiries, "can we have a drink of that?" replied: "certainly," and gave me the best drink of water I ever had. We never can forget; she lingers in my memory yet. We were all in line waiting for we knew not what. Among our boys I noticed Major W. O. Smith and Capt. Chas. McNeely, of the 7th Ky. Cavalry, and our nervy, brave little Silas Howe, of Patriot, Indiana (then 2nd Sergeant of Company E, 18th Ky., and later Major of the 55th Ky.) with his peculiarly pleasant smile, that he had carried with him heroically through the battle; most visable where bullets fell thickest, and doing with other brave and heroic comrades double and treble duty, with desperation and coolness of veterans, for three long, hot hours against the great odds of 7 to 1 and giving the enemy—as Colonel Morgan admitted—the fight of his life. Of seventeen engagements that he had participated in the affair at Cynthiana was the fiercest and most desperate, and while I desire to give to our gallant Colonel and his brave little band of heroes a part of the praise due them, it is not my purpose to detract any portion of the credit belonging to the brave boys in gray; for certainly, judging from the amount of work that came to our hands, they were not idle and must have been doing their duty and doing it well or we would have had less to do. Colonel Morgan now came along the line and gave us a nice little talk. Among other things he said that if any of us wanted to join the Confederacy his ranks were open; but the best thing I heard him say, to those who did not wish to join, he would parole them and wanted all such to go home, or wherever ordered, and respect his parole and not take up arms again until honorably exchanged. We were all paroled and the work of taking care of the dead and wounded began. Morgan treated us with the most gentlemanly courtesy, extending protection and assistance wherever needed—conduct quite in contrast with the cruel and inhuman treatment accorded him while wounded and dying later on, and when we think of this it should bring a blush of shame to the brow of every true American soldier. Too much cannot be said of Dr. McNees, of the 7th Ky. Cavalry, J. C. Frazier, A. Adams, J. A. Kirkpatrick, John A. Lair, and Dr. McLeod, for their invaluable aid rendered the sick and wounded, and especially to the noble ladies of Cynthiana for their unremitting attention and untiring administration upon the wounded and dying. While their sympathies were with the Gray, their consoling words of cheer and loving motherly hands were with the Blue as well, and served to soothe the pillow and calm many an aching brow on that eventful day. We found among the dead Thomas Ware, U. S. Commissioner, Thomas Rankin, Capt. Lafe Wilson, Jesse Current, Wm. Robinson, Nathan Kennedy, Jas. Atchinson, Simpson Eaton, Wm. Stewart, all of Harrison County Home Guards. Among the wounded: Capt. S. J. Rogers, Co. I, 18th Ky., Thos. Duvall and Hector Reed, home guards; J. W. Minor, 7th Ky. Cavalry; Jacob Carver, Co. E. 18th Ky.; Chas. Tait, 34th Ohio; Rev. Geo. Morrisson and Wm. Sanders, home guards; Jas. Little, 7th Ky. Cavalry; Christian Leden and Wm. J. Hill, home guards; A. J. Powell and Robert Rose, 7th Ky. Cavalry; Montgomery W. Rankin, (since dead) and John W. Adams, Capt. J. B. McClintock, John McClintock, L. A. Funk, L. C. Rankin, Rev. Carter Page, J. S. Frissh, J. F. St. Thomas, James E. Dickey, B. T. Amos, Wm. Nouse, home guards; Wm. Hindman, Co. E, 18th Ky.; Milton Hall, Alfred McCauley, Capt. W. H. Bradley, Thos. J. Vimont, John H. Orr, 7th Ky. Cavalry; Thos. Berry, Cincinnati Artillery; John Pussy, Co. I, 18th Ky. Some of the dead and wounded had been removed by friends before we were paroled.

Ye pencil shover made a spin around the circle, last Wednesday, and found Nathan Smith wielding his axe at a lively rate; then we came across the noted huckster, N. L. Moore, who was weighing butter and prating the market price for same at Ed Sullivan's. The next halt was at the lower ford of Gunpowder, where we found Ross Shinkle clearing off a potato patch. We went on to the home of Edward Brady, where we took dinner and met Mr. William Wilkens, of Rising Sun, who was soliciting bank accounts for the Deposit Bank and leaving with each depositor of a dollar a neat little hand safe for a home depository. We then wended our way up through the bend, where we found Chas. Craig in good health and fine spirits. We conversed awhile about the sick in that vicinity. Elijah Hodges and three sons were working in a nine acre tobacco patch, which was very fine. Hubert Ryle was sowing rye. Oscar Hodges was in a fine patch of tobacco. After a short conversation we left for Rabbit Hash, where we found the busy wheels of industry spinning in the planing mill of S. N. Riggs who was turning out some nice lumber for future use in making farm gates. We left the little hamlet at 5 p.m., for our home, where we arrived somewhat fatigued, after a very pleasant trip.

CHANCES OF PEACE.

Were Greatly Improved by the President's Action.

An Effort Is Being Made To Induce Japan to Moderate Her Demands For Indemnity From the Russian Government.

Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 16.—The crisis in the peace negotiations upon which the eyes of the world is fastened is approaching rapidly and the end of this week or the first of next at the latest should witness the deadlock and the end, if the conference is to go to pieces. Two more of the 12 articles, Nos. 4 and 6, were disposed of Tuesday. Article 4 consists of mutual pledges to observe the integrity of China and the policy of the "open door" for the commerce of all nations, and article 6 covers the surrender of the Russian leases to the Liaotung peninsula, Port Arthur, Dalny and the Blonde and Elliott islands.

Article 5, the consideration of which was postponed until later, provides for the cession of the island of Sakhalien.

Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 17.—The following official statement was issued by Mr. Sato Wednesday evening:

"At the afternoon session of the conference articles 7 and 8 were discussed: article 7 was settled in principle and article 8 accepted unanimously.

Article 7 is the cession of the branch of the Chinese Eastern railroad from Harbin southward and article 8 provides for the retention by Russia of the portion of the line through Northern Manchuria connecting the trans-Siberian road with Vladivostok.

Portsmouth, Aug. 18.—The crisis in the peace conference has been reached and pessimism is again the note. But the darkest hour is just before the dawn and there is still hope. Predictions of a final rupture Friday certainly will not be justified unless Baron Komura figuratively picks up his hat and announces that it is useless to proceed further. Mr Witte at least will not be precipitate. At Friday's session after article 11 (the limitation of Russia's sea power in the far east) and article 12 (fishing rights on the Russian littoral) are disposed of he will favor an adjournment until Monday to hear the last word from St. Petersburg.

The pessimism is based upon the fact that no progress was made Thursday. The exchange of views at the morning session on article 9 (remuneration for the "cost of the war") showed at once that the plenipotentiaries were as far apart as the poles.

Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 19.—Black pessimism reigns at Portsmouth. The prevailing view is that the fate of the peace conference is already sealed, that it has ended in failure and that all that now remains is for the plenipotentiaries to meet on Tuesday, to which day they adjourned Friday afternoon upon completing the seratim consideration of the Japanese terms, sign the final protocol and bid each other farewell.

But the eyis still room for hope of a compromise. Neither President Roosevelt nor the powers will see the chance of peace shipwrecked without a final effort and that pressure is being exerted especially at Tokio to induce Japan to moderate her terms is beyond question.

But the chances are recognized to be slim. So far as the Russian plenipotentiaries are concerned there never was a chance for their yielding both indemnity and Sakhalien. The cession of Sakhalien without indemnity was, according to the best inside information, the extreme limit to which Mr. Witte would ever consent to go and the emperor has not yet given the word even to concede that.

Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 21.—The chances of peace have undoubtedly been improved by President Roosevelt's action in stepping into the breach in a last heroic endeavor to induce the warring countries to compromise their "irreconcilable differences," but the result is still in suspense.

The ultimate decision of the issue has de facto if not de jure passed from the plenipotentiaries to their principals from Portsmouth to St. Petersburg, and perhaps in a lesser extent to Tokio. Although there are collateral evidences that pressure both by President Roosevelt and neutral powers, including Japan's ally, Great Britain, whose minister, Sir Claude MacDonald, according to advices received here, had a long conference Sunday afternoon with Mr. Katsura, the Japanese premier, is still being exerted at Tokio to induce Japan to moderate her demand there is also reason to believe that President Roosevelt was able at his interview with Baron De Rosen to practically communicate to the latter's senior, Mr. Witte, Japan's irreducible minimum—what she would yield but the point beyond which she would not go.

Whether an actual basis of compromise was proposed by the president can not be stated definitely.

Almost Impregnable Position.

Godzyanani, Manchuria, Aug. 21.—Three Russian officers who have reached the mainland from Sakhalien report that the Russian force in the interior of the island occupies an almost impregnable position and is securing the full support of the convicts.

An Enforced Armistice.

Peking, Aug. 21.—While the Japanese and Russian plenipotentiaries have failed to arrange an armistice during their negotiations the weather is enforcing an effectual armistice for the month of August.

WHAT DID THE CATCHER SAY?

Something the "Fans" Would Like to Know, But Will Never Learn.

It was the last half of the ninth.
The pitcher had gone up in the air, and the bases were as full as three goats, relates the Newark News.
The score was 3-4 in favor of the team in the field. A single would tie the score. A two-bagger would win the game.
Two men had fied out, and the man at bat had two strikes against him.
It was a crucial moment.
And as we say, the pitcher was rattled. Suddenly the catcher held up his hand. His right hand.
He removed his wire mask and stepped toward the pitcher, who advanced to meet him.
With mouth close to the pitcher's ear the catcher whispered something. What it was no one heard but the pitcher, who returned to the box.
The ball shot true across the plate.
"Strike three!" cried the umpire. The pitcher had saved the day.
Now, then, the thing we want to know is this: What did the catcher say to the pitcher?

The Reason Why.

Drummond, Wis., Aug. 21st (Special)—Whole families in Bayfield County are singing the praises of Dodd's Kidney Pills and the reason why is given in experiences such as that of Mr. T. T. Wold, a well-known citizen here.
"I had such pains in my back that I did not know what to do," says Mr. Wold, "and as I came across an advertisement of Dodd's Kidney Pills, I sent for a box. That one box relieved me of all my pains. My wife also used them and found them just what she needed. I recommend Dodd's Kidney Pills as a sure cure for Backache and other Kidney Trouble."
Backache is one of the earliest symptoms of Kidney Disease. Dodd's Kidney Pills cure it promptly and permanently and prevent it developing into Rheumatism, Dropsy, Diabetes or Bright's Disease.

AND JOHN GOT HIS PEACE.

His Better-Half Was to the Fore and Brought Things Her Way.

Three hundred motormen, gatemen, etc., were in the line in and near the offices of the Interborough Railway company trying to get their old jobs back when a large and square-jawed wife led her husband past them all as no one dared resist her, says the New York World, though many of the men had been waiting for hours.
"My husband wants to go back to work," said the woman. "He's a platform man at the ——th station," she explained.
"Been on strike?" asked Mr. Norris, one of Mr. Hedley's assistants.
"Not one minute. I wouldn't hear of such nonsense," said the woman, snapping her jaws.
"Report for duty every day?" asked Mr. Norris.
"Yes," snapped the lady. "John, you reported, didn't you?"
"None!" admitted the man, timidly.
"What!' cried the wife. "Then you disobeyed orders?"
"Yes," the poor man answered. "The fact is, the strikers wouldn't let me go up the stairs to the station. I tried every day, but they dragged me back."
"Humph! I'd like to see 'em drag me," snorted the lady. "I'd just like to see 'em! Well, Mr. Superintendent, does John get back his position or don't he?"
Mr. Norris started as if he had touched the third rail.
"Er—oh—oh-yes, madam! Oh, certainly! Yes, yes, mere matter of form. Oh, yes! Go right back to work as soon as we examine him."
All the waiting men grinned at John, who looked smaller than 30 cents' worth of radium.

WRONG SORT.

Perhaps Plain Old Meat, Potatoes and Bread May Be Against You for a Time.

A change to the right kind of food can lift one from a sick bed. A lady in Weldon, Ill., says:
"Last Spring I became bed-fast with severe stomach trouble accompanied by sick headache. I got worse and worse until I became so low I could scarcely retain any food at all, although I tried every kind. I had become completely discouraged, had given up all hope and thought I was doomed to starve to death, till one day my husband trying to find something I could retain brought home some Grape-Nuts.
"To my surprise the food agreed with me, digested perfectly and without distress. I began to gain strength at once, my flesh (which had been flabby) grew firmer, my health improved in every way and every day, and in a very few weeks I gained 20 pounds in weight. I liked Grape-Nuts so well that for 4 months I ate no other food, and always felt as well satisfied after eating as if I had sat down to a fine banquet.
"I had no return of the miserable sick stomach nor of the headaches, that I used to have when I ate other food. I am now a well woman, doing all my own work again, and feel that life is worth living.
"Grape-Nuts food has been a godsend to my family; it surely saved my life and my two little boys have thriven on it wonderfully." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

JACOB THE FUGITIVE

OUR BIBLE STORY by the "Highway and Byway" Preacher

(A Vision Between the Lines of God's Inspired Word.)

(Copyright, 1908, by J. M. Edson.)

Scripture Authority.—"And Esau hated Jacob because of the blessing wherewith his father blessed him; and Esau said in his heart, The days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob. And these words of Esau, her elder son, were told to Rebekah, and she sent and called Jacob, her younger son, and said unto him, Behold, thy brother Esau, as touching thee, doth comfort himself, purposing to kill thee. Now, therefore, my son, obey my voice; and arise, flee thou to Laban my brother to Haran. . . . And Isaac sent away Jacob; and he went to Padan-aram unto Laban, son of Bethuel, the Syrian, the brother of Rebekah, Jacob's and Esau's mother. . . . And Jacob went out of Beersheba, and went toward Haran. And he lighted on a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep. And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to Heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it."—Gen. 27:41-43; 28:5, 10-12. Read chapters 27 and 28 entire.

E said he would kill him."

"What," cried Rebekah, a deathly pallor overspreading her face and trembling so that she could scarcely stand, "did Esau say that?"

"Yes," replied the servant, "those were his very words. I was coming along the pathway which leads through the grove where Esau's tents are pitched, and, hearing voices, I paused to listen. I caught the words: 'And now he has robbed me of the blessing of the firstborn.' And then a woman's voice exclaimed: 'Well, ain't you going to do anything about it?' I pushed aside the heavy foliage and cautiously peered through. It was Esau and his wife, Judith. And then Esau asked: 'Do? What can I do, now that father has given the blessing to Jacob?' This made Judith angrier than ever and she fairly hissed: 'You fool! Dead men don't get any blessings.' A terrible look came into Esau's face then, and he cried, fiercely: 'I will kill him! I will! I will!' But I did not wait to hear any more, but hurried to tell you."

"Go and find Jacob and send him to me" exclaimed the excited mother. "Esau may even now be searching for him to kill him. Oh, my son! My son! It is I who have brought this trouble upon thee." And, overcome by her fears and troubled conscience, she sank to the ground and buried her face in her hands, while the servant rushed off to do her bidding.

"Was this to be the consequence of her plotting and Jacob's deception?" she asked herself. "But he was entitled to the blessing," she impatiently exclaimed. "Did not God promise it when He said that the elder should serve the younger?"

"Yes," answered back her conscience, "and God would have given it."

"But it didn't look like it. Wasn't Esau about to obtain the blessing? Didn't he have to look out for Jacob's interests?"

"But," spoke up her conscience again, "does one ever have to do wrong to obtain the blessing God has promised?"

"Well, it looks that way," she petulantly exclaimed, encouraging the feeling that somehow God was to blame for not having acted more promptly.

And again the voice within spoke and said: "Could you not trust God? Could you not wait on Him?"

"But I didn't," she moaned, half reproachfully.

"Why, what is the matter, mother?" exclaimed Jacob, who at that moment reached the tent door and looked in consternation and surprise at his mother as she sat on the ground rocking herself to and fro and moaning.

She pressed her hands over his in a feverish eagerness, and a relieved look came into her face as she cried:

"Then Esau hasn't found you yet?"

"Found me, mother? What for?"

"He seeks to kill thee," she whispered in strained and awesome voice.

"What shall we do, mother?"

"What canst thou do but flee?"

"But whither?"

"To Haran, to Laban, my brother. Tarry with him a few days until thy brother's fury turn away from thee, and he forget that which thou hast done to him; then I will send and fetch thee from thence; why should I be deprived also of you both in one day?" And the mother looked appealingly at her favorite son.

"Go, my son, prepare to leave at once. I will speak to thy father about it."

And as Jacob hastened away and Rebekah turned toward Isaac's tent, she wondered what she would say. She dare not tell him of Esau's threat. What excuse could she make for Jacob's going? And again the subtlety of her nature gained the upper hand, and with rare cunning she spoke of the sorrow which had come to their hearts by the marriage of Esau and pleaded that Jacob might be kept from a like mistake.

"I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth," she exclaimed. "If Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, such as these [illegible] the daughters of the land, what shall my life do me?"

"What, would Jacob [illegible] the old man, starting [illegible] be. Send him to me."

"My son," said the father, when Jacob appeared in response to his mother's summons, "thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan. Arise, go to Padan-aram, to the house of Bethuel, thy mother's father; and take thee a wife from thence, of the daughters of Laban, thy mother's brother. And God Almighty bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people."

The old man paused. As his son stood before him the consciousness that in him were to be realized all the peculiar blessings promised unto Abraham swept over him, and, placing both his hands on the young man's head, he continued, fervently:

"Yea, my son, God shall give thee the blessing of Abraham; to thee and to thy seed with thee; that thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou art a stranger, which God gave unto Abraham."

As Jacob came out of his father's tent a slight rustle in the bushes to one side attracted his attention, and he caught a fleeting glimpse of one of Esau's servants. The incident unnerved him. Had the fellow been spying upon him? Would he report to his master? Would Esau follow him? Such were the anxious queries which filled his heart as he made the final preparations for departure.

And in the meantime, what of Esau? The angry resolve of the morning, made under the wicked goading of his wife, has given place to a sober second thought. What would his father say should he take Jacob's life now? No, he would wait until the old man had died, then he could carry out his revenge without restraint. But Judith was insistent for immediate vengeance.

"Here are your bow and arrows; here is your knife! Now go! Don't be a weakling. A postponed vengeance seldom drinks the blood of the enemy."

Esau pushed the excited, vehement woman to one side and the bow and arrows went clattering to the ground, but the knife still remained in her hands. Flourishing it wildly, she cried:

"If you don't do it, I'll go and do it myself," and the angry woman turned as though she would start off at once to execute her threat, but at that moment a man burst into their midst, and breathlessly exclaimed:

"Jacob is leaving for Haran. Isaac has blessed him and sent him to thy mother's people, there to seek a wife."

"Ha, did I not tell you that he would escape thee?" cried the woman, tauntingly. "Had you sought him out this morning, as I urged, you would not have lost your opportunity."

Esau, chafing under his wife's words, moved uneasily, and turning to the servant, asked:

"When was Jacob going to start?"

"At once, I think. To-day."

"What is to hinder thy following him and slaying him in the wilderness? Thy father need never know. He will think some wild beast hath slain him," again broke in the woman.

Esau hesitated. The plan appealed to him. Judith noted the indecision, and, quickly picking up the bow and arrows she thrust them into her husband's hands, and fiercely cried:

"Go! Avenge thy wrongs, now or never!"

And without a word Esau slung bow and arrows over his shoulder, thrust his long knife into his belt and started forth and was soon out of sight. Well did he know the pathway which Jacob would take. Experienced hunter that he was, and used to trailing the fleet antelope over the hills and through the valleys, how could human prey escape him? Yes, here were footprints that had passed that way not many hours before. Ere nightfall he would come upon him. He would note his resting place and slay him in the darkness.

"But father said that the blessing of Abraham should be given me and that I should inherit the land given to him," Jacob said to himself as he tried to reassure himself and quiet his fears. Every rustle in the bushes as he passed made him start uneasily.

"Surely," he exclaimed, at last, "the God Who has given these promises is able to keep me in the present peril." And he paused weary and breathless by the side of a great rock. He felt he could go no farther. But what if Esau were close behind? Dare he pause in his flight? Dare he take one moment's rest? He started forward, and as quickly stopped as the thought swept over him again that God would help him. He leaned against the vines creeping over the rock. They parted and he fell precipitately into a narrow recess in the rock which the vines had completely hidden. So startled was he by the suddenness of it all that he did not hear the hurried footsteps as they passed. He did not see Esau's tense, set face as he sped by. He did not hear his muttered oath as he exclaimed: "He cannot be much ahead of me now." But Jacob as he lay there dazed and bruised had a strange feeling of calmness come stealing into his heart. Was it the answering assurance of faith He hardly knew what faith was. Was it the awakening consciousness of God and of God's overruling providences for him? Perhaps. Certain it is that as he sat in the little retreat and rested his thoughts were of the God of his fathers and what had been promised him. And as the sun sank to rest and the night settled down he roused himself from his reveries and stepped forth from his narrow shelter. And he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep. And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to Heaven. And behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. And [illegible] to him there that night. And [illegible] rose early in the morning and took [illegible] that he had put [illegible] pillows [illegible] up for a pillar, and poured [illegible] of it. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] house of God.

ROTTEN REPUBLICANISM.

Party in Power in League with All Kinds of Plundering Politicians.

When the democrats claimed that the republican party of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania was politically and morally rotten, the republican press of the country defended the organization and gloried in the large fraudulent majority that was rolled up in 1896, 1900 and 1904. How many congressmen from Pennsylvania have held seats in the national legislature and will sit in the coming congress, whose elections are tainted and whose majorities are composed of fraudulent votes, it is impossible to say; but a witness of the highest authority in the republican party has just declared that the Philadelphia rottenness is a "stain which a corrupt and criminal combination masquerading under the name of republicans has put upon her." That evidence is given by Elihu Root, republican secretary of state, and he has just investigated conditions in Philadelphia as attorney for Mayor Weaver and had the evidence before him that compelled him to use such vigorous and descriptive language of what had so far been unearthed that it is safe to say his opinion of the republican organization is not overdrawn.

Mayor Weaver of Philadelphia joined with the anti-ring republicans in undertaking to reform the city government, but no move has been made to cleanse the state government which has bolstered up and profited by the plundering of the cities. Until the republican state ring is ousted and an honest legislature elected, there can be no permanent reform in the cities.

Nearly every strongly republican state is suffering from the same desperate conditions that have been partially exposed in Pennsylvania, and only in one state, Wisconsin, has the party in power attempted to reform and turn the rascals out. Gov. La Follette has partially accomplished that task, in spite of the railroads and corporations, and his most active supporters have been the democrats of Wisconsin.

In all the worst ring ruled states it is without exception to be noted that the railroad corporations, with their immense power for political evil, are always found siding with the ring, so that they can more easily plunder the people by escaping taxation and by charging unreasonable rates.

By the same test it will be found that all state officials and congressmen who are being interviewed on railroad rate legislation who fear that government control will be disastrous to the railroads and the people, can, without exception, be classed as belonging to the republican ring. Therefore the first reformation must be to depose the railroads from political power, and the initial step is for congress to protect the public by regulating the rates the railroads can charge. The position of the democrats in the last congress in urging the passage of the Davey bill is the best proof they are on the side of the people.

The government, of course, could not prevent the drought which caused the famine, but it should have set relief measures in progress in time to prevent any such awful distress as is now said to exist.—Buffalo Express.

——During a recent political meeting in London at which England's fiscal policy was discussed, Felix Schuster told of a conversation he had had with President McKinley some time before the president's assassination. Mr. Schuster had remarked that the question of protection would soon be raised in England. "Long before that," said President McKinley, "we shall become a free trade country."—Chicago Chronicle.

——The government is planning to advertise exclusively for laborers in the canal zone. It may be hard to get "testimonials, but "before and after" pictures of workmen who have been on the isthmus can be used with telling effect—by transposing the labels.—N. Y. Post.

——"We are holding the Philippines in violation of our principles, because it pays," asserts Mr. Bryan, in the Commoner. "This is a surprise. Will Mr. Bryan please make the nation jubilant by showing where the profit arrives?" retorts the Pittsburg Dispatch (Rep.).

BEING CONTROLLED.

For Several Days Number of New Cases of Fever Showed a Decline.

New Orleans, Aug. 21.—Following is the official report up to 6 p. m. Sunday: New cases, 45; total cases to date, 1,385; deaths, 4; total deaths to date, 196; new foci, 11; total foci to date, 306; cases under treatment, 381.

New Orleans, Aug. 21.—No better evidence of the fact that the visitation of mosquito fever is not only being controlled here but that there is a chance for its eradication can be found than in the daily reports of cases and deaths. For several days now the number of new cases has shown a decline, while the number of deaths have been remarkably lower, considering the number of cases reported a week ago. The death list indicates that practically every case that develops is not being reported and that means that the modern method of treatment to prevent spread is being applied. When that condition is assured the end of visitation is in sight and it looks as if that condition is approaching.

VICEROY OF INDIA.

Lord Curzon Resigns and the Earl of Minto Succeeds Him.

London, Aug. 21.—The resignation of Lord Curzon, of Kedleston, as viceroy of India and the appointment of the Earl of Minto as his successor, was announced at the India office.

According to the correspondence which is issued in the form of a white book it appears that Lord Curzon's resignation was cabled to that office on August 12. The correspondence shows a decidedly bitter feeling between Lord Curzon, the India office and Lord Kitchener, commander-in-chief of the forces in India, over the new plan of army administration in India. Lord Curzon's dissatisfaction came to a head with the refusal of the cabinet to appoint Maj. Gen. Sir Edmund Barrow, on Lord Curzon's recommendation, military supply member of the council.

THE DOUMA PROJECT.

The Papers of St. Petersburg Comment on the New Scheme.

St. Petersburg, Aug. 21.—The Novoe Vremya and the Russky Slovo unreservedly praise the douma project. The other St. Petersburg newspapers, however, fail to show much enthusiasm. While half-heartedly admitting that the project makes for improvement, these latter papers criticise the limitation powers of the douma and ask for an extension of the freedom of the press, freedom of meeting and political amnesty.

The Novoe Vremya declares the wall which that for centuries separated the nation from the sovereign has fallen and that the new reform opens the way for the development of national individuality and genius which is necessary for the evolution of a great people.

The Russky Slovo says that the new douma will bring Russia into line with the western nations.

PLATFORM COLLAPSED.

More Than 500 People Precipitated 15 Feet Into a Cellar.

Pittsburg, Aug. 21.—More than 500 men, women and children were precipitated 15 feet into a cellar by the collapse of a platform during the exercises incident to the laying of the corner stone of the Beth David Russian Hebrew Orthodox synagogue on Miller steet. Among the more seriously injured are Rabbis Ashinski, S. Graffman and S. Bloom. Nathan Nathanson, pastor of the congregation, and Policeman Adam Leftewski.

Mauz, led the parade and hundreds of school children sang in English.

LONG AND SHORT HAUL CLAUSE.

It Is Charged That It Is Being Violated By Three Railway Companies.

Frankfort, Ky., Aug. 17.—The Kentucky railroad commission filed with the interstate commerce commission a charge that section 4 of the act to regulate interstate commerce, the long and short haul clause, is being violated by the L. & N., Illinois Central and L., H. & St. L. Railroad Cos., and their connecting carriers in that discrimination of ten per cent. in rates is being made to and from what is known as Trunk Line and Central Freight Association territory to and from Owensboro and Henderson, this state, as compared with other points similarly situated, especially with Evansville, Ind., and contiguous territory. The further charge is made that the adjustment of rates to and from southern and southeastern territory to these points are not fair and just. Breakfast was served at 10 o'clock, followed by undress guard mount. The daily routine was continued and at 5:30 the first dress parade took place, in which the troops made an excellent showing. No sooner had they got in camp than several of the men sneaked off to a watermelon patch and were run out with a shotgun. They returned with a turkey, and it was reported they killed it on J. H. Utlerbank's farm, but they contended they bought it. Over 100 soldiers who had left the camp were arrested by a provost marshal and guards, and it required a special train of street cars to take them back. At general headquarters they were released with a talk from Inspector Gen. Noel Gaines.

FEUDISTS FIGHT.

One Is Shot To Death and Another Badly Wounded.

Lexington, Ky., Aug. 19.—A special dispatch from Pikeville tells of a second meeting of the feud clans of the Mullins and Flemings. In a battle on the pike at the Letcher county line, Monroe Seward, a member of the Mullins faction, was killed, and Henry Mullins dangerously wounded. Henry Mullins, Seward and two or three other men whose names were not given were riding along the road. They carried Winchesters across their saddles, but before they were aware of trouble, they had fallen into an ambush laid, it is claimed, by the Flemings faction. The shooting was general, but as the aims of the Flemings fighters was unusually bad, all escaped, save Seward and Henry Mullins. Creed Vanover, of the Flemings faction, was slightly injured.

Ira S. Bennett, quartermaster; Sergt. Maj. F. M. Terry; commissary sergeant, Carter Wilson, and Private H. A. Graves arrived. Quite a surprise was sprung at general headquarters when Col. Noal Gaines learned that Elmer Townsend, who sued him for $10,000 damages for putting him in the guardhouse, was a member of the state guard. He belongs to Company I, Paducah, which has never been mustered out on account of some property not being accounted for. At the time Col. Gaines thought Townsend was a civilian. He will be rearrested and tried by court-martial.

GIRLS IN LOVE.

Suicided Because They Feared Their Love Was Not Returned.

Paintsville, Ky., Aug. 17.—The suicide in Big Shoals, Ky., of a beautiful young woman, who left a note that she was tired of life because she feared that the young man on whom she had voluntarily bestowed her affections did not care for her, recalls the self-destruction of another pretty girl near there about three months ago. She also left a note that she had decided to shuffle off the mortal coil because her affections were not reciprocated. Both young women, strangers to each other, as later investigation has disclosed, named the same young man as the Adonis without whom life to them was not worth the living. His name is John Damron, according to the notes they left, and he lives in Pikeville, Ky.

BOONE CO. RECORDER

A New York firm was awarded the contract for erecting Kentucky's new capitol at $880,000, the work to be completed within two years. It is to be of Bedford, Indiana, stone.

What is the explanation for the remarkably big oats crop we have this season? Was it the wet spring? If so it shows what irrigation would do on our soil.—Indiana Farmer.

The two banks, both national, in Lawrenceburg, have agreed upon a merger to go into effect in September. Each is a strong bank, and when merged the new bank thus formed will be very strong.

Puts an End to It,

A grievous wail oftimes comes as a result of unbearable pain from overtaxed organs, Dizziness, Backache, Liver complaint and Constipation. But thanks to Dr King's New Life Pills they put an end to it all. They are gentle but thorough. Try them. Only 25c. Guaranteed by all Drug Stores.

There is a clamor all over the country for cheap feeding cattle, says the Breeders Gazette. This is likely to be a high priced crop of corn and the stocker man must mark down the price of his goods. Iowa and Nebraska want $3.25 and $3.50 feeders and intimate that these prices must be quoted to secure a free movement toward feed lots. At present the country is watching the growing corn crop. August is the month of development and much of the area is so backward that no definite conclusion can be formed within five or six weeks, but the demand for cheap feeders is insistant and no other kind will be wanted.

A very novel but commendable institution is about to be established at Houston, Texas, to be called "The Bachelor Baby Farm." It is to be an institution, as its name implies, for caring for and rearing orphan children or those without means of support, the expenses of the establishment and the maintenance of the home to be borne by the bachelors of that city. The city with a population of about fifty thousand is said to have an unusual percentage of unmarried men, and, being unincumbered with families, they desire to contribute to the unfortunate children of others. It is estimated that some of the old bachelors in Kentucky contemplate subscribing for stock in the iustitution, provided it is nonassessable.

The skirmishing in the fight for the Democratic nomination for U. S. Senator to succeed Senator Blackburn, is about over, and the skirmishing is likely to constitute the entire fight. In the next caucus to name the Democratic candidate for U. S. Senator, there will be not less than one hundred votes, and at this time and from this distance it looks as though Senator Blackburn will not receive to exceed thirty of these votes. Nearly all the Democratic candidates that were to be nominated for the two houses of the next General Assembly have been named, and a carefully kept tab shows that they stand about three for Judge Paynter to one for Senator Blackburn. The tide was in favor of Judge Paynter at the beginning of the campaign, and at no time has it ebbed, but, on the contrary, has appeared to increase. Judge Paynter has made a canvass becoming the dignity of the office to which he aspires, and his election which now appears to be a foregone conclusion, will elevate an able and deserving gentleman to the U. S. Senatorship. His success will be the more brilliant because of his easy victory over one who has so long occupied such a high and honorable position in the greatest deliberative body known to men. J. C. S. Blackburn has been a Democratic idol in Kentucky, and when he surrenders the toga to Judge Paynter, he will have the satisfaction of knowing that his displacement is not because his party loves him less, but because it loves Judge Paynter more.

What Does Free Turnpikes Mean?

They mean an unjust act. What do they mean to the farmers? They mean a double increase of tax. What do they mean to the poor man? They mean a heavier tax—they mean for him to pay more rent for his house or land. If he is giving part of the crop they mean for him to give more, because the landlord's taxes will be increased. What do they mean to the teamster? They mean that he must pay more for produce and charge less for hauling. To the huckster or merchant they mean to invite others who pay no tax to engage in the same business. To the pleasureseeker they mean take all the pleasure they can at the expense of others.

WALTON 7; BOONES 4.

The above tells the result of the game between the Walton and Boone ball teams at Walton last Saturday afternoon. The Walton sluggers found Conner's slants and curves just to their liking, and gave him the severest lambasting he has received at the hands of any team he has faced this season, the score showing nine hits of which there was one home run; one three and one two bagger. The Boones made eight hits. With all their heavy hitting Conner had the Walton boys guessing a considerable part of the time, and fanned 9 of them while DeJarnette struck out only two. It was a nice game throughout, and another instance in which the Boones were simply outclassed at about every point in the game, but the very excellent treatment accorded them by the Walton team, atoned in a great measure, for the decisive drubbing they administered.

Letter From Atlantic City.

Atlantic City, N. J., Aug. 18, 1905.

FRIEND RECORDER:—You will perhaps be surprised at receiving a communication from me, written from this part of the world. J. W. Conner and I arrived here on the 11th inst. at 9 a. m., and will start for home at 3 p. m. to day. We expect to stop over at Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and will not get home till the latter part of the week. I shall not attempt a description of this place as it would take a Dickens or an Irving to do the subject justice. I suppose though, Atlantic City stands at the head of the list as an ideal bathing resort, and has more visitors during the season then any other place of the kind in the world. It is situated on Absecon Island, which is 10 miles long by 4 miles wide. The board walk on the water front is in the form of a crescent, and is 40 feet wide, extending the entire length of the city or 4 miles. This is crowded with people nearly all the time.

The number of visitors here now is estimated at 200,000, and every train coming in brings many more to swell the crowd. Standing on the Board Walk you have a clear view of the beach as far as the eye can reach, and it is no unusual sight to see 1,000 in bathing at once, ranging in age from 2 to 80 years, and of both sexes. It is certainly very amusing to see some of the old folks battling with the breakers. It is a common occurrence to see some solemn old, gray haired father leading his better-half out to meet the incoming waves, coaxing and encouraging her to venture farther out, till an unexpected heavy swell strikes them, and sends them rolling in the surf towards the shore.

One notable thing that I observed here is the perfect order. I have not seen the least sign of disorder or drunkenness since I have been here. Although the throng is from all quarters of the globe, the best of order prevails and good fellowship and politeness is the rule.

Yours, &c., L. H. VOSHELL.

Edward Botts, of Plattsburg, presented this office with a basket of very large, delicious peaches, one day last week. They were of the Alberta and Daniel Boone varieties, and simply could not be beaten for appearance and flavor. Yum, yum!

The fair begins next Wednesday, and don't you forget it.

Jerry Delph put his saw mill in operation again, Monday.

Considerable fruit has been hauled through town in the last few weeks.

Some complaint of tobacco rotting and falling off of the stalk in the patch.

This has been a hard year on the dirt roads, especially in the hill country.

It did not rain on Monday this week, therefore some clear weather may be expected.

It is said that there is corn in Bellevue neighborhood that will make 75 bushels to the acre.

The young men of Burlington, too numerous to mention, are at home again after a brief vacation.

The teams that are hauling the brick for the bank building bring 1000 at a load from Erlanger.

Melon wagons from the Bellevue melon fields are circulating in this part of the county every day.

So far this has been a year of disasters, and the loss of life by accidents has been unusually large.

The free turnpike petitions are being sent into county Attorney Castleman for filing in the county court.

Two blocks of stock in the North Kentucky Agricultural Association sold last week at a premium of $5 to the block.

The Boone County Telephone Company put a 'phone in N. S. Walton's residence last Monday, for his son Dr. Hubert Walton.

Several of Miss Essie Parish's Erlanger friends came over, one evening last week, to assist her celebrate the anniversary of her birth.

Considerable tobacco has been cut, and the indications are that in the matter of pounds the 1905 crop will excel any crop this county has produced in many years. It is too early to judge as to the quality.

In many sections of the county the growing crops have been damaged considerably by the wind, hail and rain. In some instances the soil and growing crops have been swept away, entailing a heavy loss to farmers.

Two teachers, Walter Gibbs, principal of Walton Graded High School, and Miss Mary Bolton, of Missouri, who will teach in district No. 18 (Bullittsville), were granted certificates under the examination of last Friday and Saturday.

According to a report just made by State Superintendent Fuqua, of the Department of Public Instruction, there are 730,340 children of school age in Kentucky. The report shows a decrease of 5,421 as compared with last year. The school fund is given as $2,420,879.80.

The sale of the realty and personal estate of the late J. J. Lillard, next Tuesday, will attract a very large crowd, if the weather is favorable. There are all kinds of guesses as to what will be the highest bid made for the farm, for which there are expected to be several bidders.

Attorney Walker C. Hall, of Covington, lost his pocket book as he was coming out to Burlington. It was a plethoric wallet—it contained four one hundred dollar bills and 55 dollars in fives and tens. Mr. Hall drew the money out of the bank that morning to take with him on a trip on which he was to leave on Friday morning.

A. M. Acra, of Burlington, took one first and ten second premiums on his poultry at Oakley fair, last week, while Joseph Scott, of Florence, captured eight first and four second premiums on Jersey cattle, and Joseph Huey, Tanner & Fisk and J. A. Riddell took premiums on horses. Miss Mary Riddell won third prize as best lady rider.

Farmers are all feeling good. The wheat crop has about all been threshed, and prices have been as good or better than usual. The hemp and tobacco crops never looked better than at present while every farmer in the county has more hay and grass than usual. The Kentucky corn crop is now made, and the yield will be the best known in years. Renters have made money this year, and they, too, are feeling much better than usual.—Scott County Democrat.

The following item from an exchange is not published to encourage girls to advertise for husbands, but for the purpose of showing that it pays to advertise:

"A Texas girl advertised for a husband and got him. The total for advertising, wedding outfit etc., was $11. Within a year he died, leaving her an insurance policy for $10,000. With some of this money she bought fashionable store clothes, went to N. Y., married a billionaire, and shortly afterward got a divorce from him and $15,000 a year almony as long as she lives."

The Lawrenceburg Press says: "Rain part of each of the four days of the fair operated against its success financially, and in consequence there is a deficit of about $200. The exhibition as a whole was commendable and seemed to please the people with its variety. The attendance was largely made up of country people, the citizens of Lawrenceburg showing but little appreciation of the management to give a clean, up to date fair. All of the features advertised were presented, and the program of the entire week was carried out as advertised."

A ball will be given at Leidersafet hall in Lawrenceburg, on the evening of the 28th inst., for the benefit of a barber by the name of Taylor, who is a victim of consumption. His illness of several months has so exhausted his means and those of his parents that he is now wholly without means with which to procure proper food and medical attention. He is a deserving young man, and it is hoped that the general public will assist him through this medium or otherwise. Donations for this purpose may be sent to David A. Platt, Lawrenceburg, Indiana.

T. Z. Roberts, who resides near Middle creek cliffs, has constructed an observatory on one of the high points near his house, and has a powerful field glass with which he sweeps a very large territory in Kentucky, Ohio and Indiana. It is said that he can count the rows of shingles on houses that are 15 miles back from the river in Indiana. Some of his friends say that he did not go to all the expense and trouble of constructing the observatory just for the amusement it will afford, but auspect that he is looking for a wife from the top of it.

Corn is King in Kentucky this year, and the harvest of this important crop promises to exceed by hundreds of thousands of bushels the yield of any other year, says the Elizabethtown News. The crop is now practically safe with the exception of some very late planting. One of the most beneficent things in connection with the crop is that the farmer on poor land, who usually has a scanty crop and sometimes nothing at all, will share this season with the rich farmer. Thousands of farmers who are usually fortunate in raising ten bushels of corn to the acre will have thirty and forty and more corn in many cases than there is place to store.

NOTICE TO EXHIBITORS.

Radashes, Peppers, Pumpkins, Cantaloupes, Largest Pumpkin and best Display of Vegetables, are on the second day's program, but they should be on the fourth day's program, on which day, only, vegetables will be exhibited.

On Draft colt 2 years old and unders 8, the premiums are first premium $6, second premium $3. This ring was ommitted in making up the premium list.

The premiums on allpurpose colt 3 years old and under 4, regardless of sex, is $10 and $5 instead of $20 and $10 as appears in the catalogue.

ALVIN PERRY, Secretary.
North Ky. Agricultural Association.

Married, on the 16th inst., by County Judge P. E. Cason, at his office in the court house, Frank A. Huber, electrician, of Covington, Ky., and Miss Sarah C. Riley, of Cedar Point, Ohio, and a daughter of the late William Riley, of Beaver neighborhood, this county. The bride was given away by her guardian, Judge John M. Lassing, and at the conclusion of the ceremony Judge Cason saluted the bride in the most approved style. Mr. and Mrs. Huber left the town doubly happy as they were not only man and wife but Mrs. Huber, immediately upon her marriage, drew from her guardian a considerable sum of money. She owns some real estate in Beaver neighborhood.

The public schools are due to commence in the next few weeks. This is an event in which parents should take great interest, but, on the contrary, they pay no attention to it, and in some instances it is weeks before some of them learn the name of the preceptor in charge of their children. This is not as it should be. Every parent should realize the importance of having none but good instructors for their children, and more especially when they are small, for as the twig is bent the tree will incline. A parent may place in the hands of his child great riches, and in a few short years they may take wings and disappear, but, if the child is given an education, it is equipped for the battle of life in a permanent manner, and so long as life lasts he will be able to cope with its realities and better calculated to become a useful citizen.

The East Enterprise Fair.

The 54th annual of this popular old fair will be held on the beautiful and spacious grounds at East Enterprise, Indiana, September 5th 6th, 7th and 8th, 1905 and a big lot of money is being spent on it to make the fair one of the best. The special poultry show under the auspices of the poultry clubs of Vevay and Warsaw, Ky., will be held Thursday, Sept. 7th, and it will be worth seeing. $740.00 will be expended in the horse races; $175.00 pacing race, $175.00 trotting race $100 00 running race. Among the special features will be "Fun at the Mill." An old fashioned Dutch grist mill is erected on the ground, and two acrobats who are also funny actors make a lot of fun by ludicrous positions jumping out the windows, etc. "From Horn to Horn" is a mid air flight by the wonderful Melville, who was the drawing card at Barnum & Bailey's great circus. This act alone is worth the 35 cents price of admission to the fair, which is the only charge made. Come Thursday. Send for premium list to Scott Thompson, Secretary, Rising Sun, Indiana, or D. B. Wallace, Warsaw, Ky.

The grand jury was discharged Wednesday afternoon, and the petit jurors were discharged on Thursday.

The grand jury returned 10 indictments, two of them against George Richey, each charging him with murder.

Mrs. P. E. Gaines, of Boone county, who is visiting her son, W. L. Gaines, the druggist, slipped on the pavement yesterday morning and broke her arm at the wrist.—Carrollton News.

J. J. Huey, of Rising Sun, was one of the RECORDER'S appreciated callers, last week. Johnnie is a great admirer of the "Sun," but he will always be a genuine corneracker. It matters not where his lot is cast.

Assessor Watts has been quite busy for several days making up his roster of Boone county—property owners, on whom he will make his annual call after the 15th of next month. He will be assisted in his work by W. P. Beemon.

John Case is spending a few days at Niagara Falls, in Canada and on the lakes, before he enters upon a six months' term with the young idea. If the picture on the postal card Mr. Case sent to this office from Niagara Falls represents his swelldupdis since] he went north, he has been growing some.

To Visitors of the Florence Fair

First-class meals and lodging will be furnished by Misses Irene and Kate Bradford at their home on the Union pike. First brick house opposite Fair Grounds. Special terms for the week.

Walter Crigler's little boy was kicked in the stomach by a horse at Hebron school house, last week, and for several days it was thought the child would not survive the effects of the kick, but at last accounts it was doing very well.

Joseph Riddell, of Bellevue, died last Monday afternoon at 4 p. m., just three weeks to the hour nearly from the time he was hurt by falling from a wagon. He had been afflicted with a kidney trouble for quite a while, and it was that his death resulted. He was in his 77th year, was a son of John and Florinda (McKay) Riddell. He was born and raised in this county where he spent his entire life as a tiller of the soil. In 1861 he was married to Eliza Marshall, daughter of the late Tutor P. Marshall. To them were born two daughters, Mrs. James Setters and Mrs. James Riley, both of whom and his wife, survive him. He always took a great interest in all public issues, but could never be induced to contest for an office but once when he and the late W. H. Baker made a very close race for sheriff of Boone county, he being a whig and Baker a democrat. Joseph Riddell was a plain, unassuming man in whom everybody who knew him had perfect confidence, and his word was as good as his bond. The funeral services will be conducted at 2 p. m. this afternoon by Rev. Edgar Riley and the Masons, of which order he was an old member.

One week from today the tenth annual exhibition of the North Kentucky Agricultual Association will begin on the grounds of the Association near Florence, this county. This exhibition is known as the Boone or Florence Fair, and is conceded to be, by large odds, the best county fair in Kentucky. Its list of premiums comprehends everything that is grown on the farm, made for the pantry or produced by the dairy, while all kinds of needle work, art painting and other fancy work executed by the ladies is recognized and given liberal premiums. Thousands of people attend this fair every year, where old acquaintances are renewed and new ones made. It is an event that is looked forward to from year to year, and the person who attends it once is very apt to be there every year thereafter, as no other place in this part of the State furnishes such excellent opportunities to enjoy a four days' vacation frought with so many pleasures. The liberal premiums bring good stock, good stock makes a good show, which everybody desires to see, consequently an appreciative public passes through the gates every day while the fair is in progress. Everything points to a record breaking exhibition this year, especially of farm and garden products. Stalls for stock have been applied for by some of the best horsemen in the Blue Grass, who will be there good and strong.

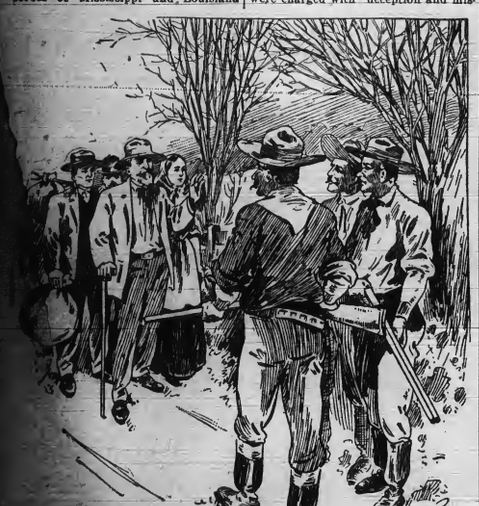
SHOTGUN QUARANTINE AND WAR ON YELLOW FEVER

THRILLING PHASES OF THE BATTLE BEING WAGED IN THE STRICKEN DISTRICTS OF LOUISIANA.



A CLASH OF ARMED FORCES IS THREATENED

Exciting Incidents in Which the Governors of Two States Figured—Federal Government in Charge Directing Scientific War on the Disease and the Mosquito.

New Orleans, La.—The shotgun quarantine which has prevailed in the southern states bordering on the fever-stricken districts of Louisiana has been one of the exciting and spectacular features of the outbreak of the scourge this year. Refugees from New Orleans and the other Louisiana towns in which the yellow fever has appeared have been hemmed in with gatling guns and muskets in the detention camps along the coast or near the state lines of Mississippi, Texas and Alabama. Great railroad and steamship transportation lines, extending around half a continent, have been "shut down" so far as New Orleans and all Louisiana are concerned. Passenger traffic is paralyzed, and even the freight traffic is affected.

In the railroad stations just across the Louisiana line in Mississippi and Texas—but most rigidly in Mississippi—all travelers through Louisiana are placed indiscriminately in the "refugee" class. They are herded for hours and sometimes for days in these "border stations" or in so-called "camps" to which they are removed by force. Once in a "detention camp," which is seldom a particularly sanitary place, there is little or no chance for the detained traveler to gain his freedom until the end of the customary term of five days' quarantine. Only then is he allowed to go his way, and all that he gets for his loss of time and the endurance of the horrors of the detention camp is a health certificate of doubtful value in the next state he enters.

In the enforcement of the quarantine there have been numerous clashes of authority, and clashes of arms were imminent on several occasions. Armed forces of Mississippi and Louisiana confronted each other during the early stages of the outbreak on land and water. Menace of an interstate war was prevalent and hostilities might have begun on a grand scale at any moment. Intervention of the marine forces of the United States was looked for and invited as the only means of preventing bloodshed.

Shotgun Guard Turning Back Refugees.

Governors in Wordy War.

Spectacular berating of each other by the governor of Mississippi and the governor of Louisiana preceded the arming of the two states' armed forces [illegible] positions mutually hostile. Invasion of Louisiana territory by land and water was charged by the Louisiana governor against the militia forces of Mississippi.

[illegible] of authority over navigable waters of the United States was [illegible] of the charges that Governor [illegible] of Louisiana fulminated against the coast patrol-boats put into commission, with arms and ammunition for sharp-shooting militiamen, by Governor Vardaman of Mississippi.

In [illegible] Governor Blanchard [illegible] armed patrol-boats [illegible] "bot-[illegible] Louisiana other-[illegible] a part [illegible] of hav-[illegible] of

"You have no right to prohibit boats from navigating lake, sound and gulf channels which are navigable waters of the United States," thundered his excellency of Mississippi, "and the limit of your powers is to prevent boats from landing on Mississippi shores. No such state of affairs can be tolerated."

After this outburst it was thought that blood would surely flow. But it didn't. Instead of sending a fleet of patrol-boats to smash the cruising craft of Mississippi in a brilliant naval engagement that would dwarf the exploits of a Dewey or a Togo, his excellency of Louisiana dictated a ringing appeal to the federal government at Washington to intervene and curb the fiery Vardaman's naval operations.

Imbroglio on Land.

A clash between the land forces of the two states seems to have been more probable than between the forces afloat in gulf and bay. Violation of the sacred soil of Louisiana by invasion of Mississippi soldiers was the cause of the imbroglio on land. Dunbar, a small town on the Louisiana side of the state line, was the place invaded by the troops from Mississippi. It was not claimed that the invaders came with hostile intent and their real mission was known to be to get their meals, as Dunbar was the only accessible place to get food in the country where the armed men of Mississippi were maintaining one of the quarantine camps. But the governor of Louisiana had hardened his heart against the governor of Mississippi because of the latter's sensational pronouncement, in which the authorities of New Orleans and all Louisiana were charged with "deception and misrepresentation" in the alleged withholding from the outside world of the information that the yellow fever had broken out in the Crescent City. So Gov. Blanchard ordered Gov. Vardaman to keep his troops at his own side of the state line, which in effect was a denial to them of a place to eat on Louisiana's terra firma.

Because of the friction engendered by the fierce controversy of the two governors the travelers seeking to break through the quarantine lines were held back at the cannon's mouth and the point of bayonet. It was an unusual state of affairs—a condition unique in the history of the country.

When the New Orleans populace realized that soldiers of the neighboring state had invaded Louisiana with arms and gunboats the indignation was so intense and general that even the pressing necessity of fighting the spread of yellow fever by making war upon mosquitoes was not permitted to stand in the way of preparations for measures of reprisals and retaliation. A light-draft vessel was chartered for the naval brigade of the state's militia and it was announced that this vessel would be fitted out and armed with howitzers and machine guns and would start out to protect Louisiana citizens from further aggressions.

At Beaumont and Marshall, as well as other points on the Texas border and coast, the citizens have armed themselves with shotguns to reenforce the quarantine regulations that the Lone Star state has so far failed to back up with the rifles and bayonets and cannons of its militia. Border towns in Alabama and Arkansas have also met the refugees from Louisiana with shotguns and turned them back or imprisoned them in quarantine camps. Even as far north as Tennessee and southern Illinois the quarantine is maintained to a certain extent, but in these latter districts it is a modified quarantine and without the menacing adjunct of shotguns or bayonets. Memphis, it may be recalled, has as much reason as any city in the world to impose a rigorous quarantine in times of danger from yellow fever, as, with perhaps the exceptions of New Orleans and Philadelphia, no other city in the world has been scourged so dreadfully or so nearly depopulated from yellow fever as has Memphis. In the "yellow jack" epidemics of a generation ago, when the people of New Orleans were dying like flies, the population of Memphis was being decimated almost equally as fast. But that was before science had come to the rescue by stepping to the front and showing that this greatest of yellow perils might be controlled and eliminated by simply controlling or exterminating a certain fly—the female of a certain mosquito family which science discovered was the only possible propagator of the deadly, but as yet unidentified, germ of yellow feyer.

Draining of swamps contiguous to this city and the raising of the grade of its streets to a height that would permit drainage by underground sewers, to replace the present surface sewers, are advocated by many as desirable steps in the crusade against the infectious Mrs. Mosquito. Indeed, there are many improvements of this sort planned and portions of them are in course of construction. The programme is for a complete sanitary system of water works and sewers, the cost to be $16,000,000. But it will take three years or more before this great and much-needed improvement can be finished.

May Oil All Swamps.

Whether any plan may be found for rendering the great swamps to the southeast and south of this city undesirable places as breeding grounds for the countless myriads of mosquitoes that swarm into our streets and homes and business houses when the wind is blowing inland must be considered one of the greatest problems that New Orleans and the state of Louisiana will have to deal with in the near future. Outsiders may consider that we are never immune so long as we are exposed to these two things—the capriciousness of the winds of heaven and the fecundity of the mosquito tribe that domiciles in the irreclaimable swamps of our coast. But our case, nevertheless, is not hopeless. This great state will find a way to meet all difficulties. It is rich enough and enterprising enough to oil all the swamps of our coast every year and it may do that very thing if this year's test of the "mosquito theory" proves its entire correctness.

Federal Government in Charge.

In response to the appeal of the city of New Orleans, the federal government promptly took charge of the fight against the yellow fever, and Surgeon General Walter Weyman, head of the United States marine hospital service, and his splendid corps of trained helpers, are waging a battle royal day and night to stamp out the scourge. The city authorities are lending the heartiest cooperation and the defense fund of $150,000 asked by the government to exterminate the disease has been raised.

Though generally people are willing to submit to the regulations of the health authorities, there are some who refuse to believe in the mosquito theory and who oppose the oiling of their cisterns and the cleansing of their premises. The Era club members, who are women, have vlounteered to proselyte among this class of the community.

There is a mosquito ordinance that requires landlords to screen cisterns. Fine or imprisonment is the penalty for refusal to obey the ordinance. Very few houses in the city are without cisterns, and 40,000 to 50,000 of them will be screened. The city is now spending $16,000,000 upon a water and sewerage system which, when completed, will require the abandonment of all cisterns. It will, however, be two or three years before this system is in operation and in the interval the oiling and screening process will be essential if the breeding places of the fever-bearing mosquito are to be wiped out.

Famous Investigation in Havana.

The famous investigation made in Havana in 1900 and 1901 by the American military commission, composed of Maj. W. Reed, M. D., and Drs. J. Carroll, A. Argamonte and Jesse W. Lazear, established the mosquito theory of the origin of yellow fever beyond all question and paved the way to the emancipation of Havana from a disease which had prevailed there for a century and a half. In these experiments Maj. Reed, with other officers and privates of the United States army, risked their lives in the demonstration. Assistant Surgeon Jesse W. Lazear lost his life in the attempt.

When Dr. Lazear, who was one of the three volunteers who offered themselves in Havana for the first tests in the yellow fever experiments, took the fever and died as a direct result of the experiment, his name and fame were heralded abroad. A monument was erected to his memory at the Johns Hopkins university, of which he was a graduate. Every medical journal in the world contained extensive accounts of his sacrifice. This was all very right and proper, for the intrepid physician literally gave up his life in the cause of science.

But at the same time there were two other men who took the same risks. Their bravery was no less than his. For none of them could see the end. One of these other two, Dr. Carroll, sickened with the dreadful disease, but recovered. The other, who had been the first to bare his arm to the bite of the insect, escaped.

This young man was Dr. A. S. Pinto, now of Omaha. Dr. Pinto says little of his brave exploit in offering himself as a possible victim upon the altar of science.

The Study of Yellow Fever.

In June, 1900, Maj. Reed was sent to Cuba as president of a board to study the infectious diseases of the country, but more especially yellow fever. Associated with him were Acting Assistant Surgeons James Carroll, Jesse W. Lazear and A. Agramonte. At this time the American authorities in Cuba had for a year and a half endeavored to diminish the disease and mortality of the Cuban towns by general sanitary work, but while the health of the population showed distinct improvement and the mortality had greatly diminished, yellow fever apparently had been entirely unaffected by these measures. In fact, owing to the large number of nonimmune foreigners, the disease was more frequent than usual in Havana and in Quemados, near the camp of American troops, and many valuable lives of American officers and soldiers had been lost. Reed was convinced from the first that general sanitary measures alone would not check the disease, but that its transmission was partly due to an insect.

The fact that malarial fever, caused by an animal parasite in the blood, is transmitted from man to man through the agency of certain mosquitoes, had been recently accepted by the scientific world; also, several years before, Dr. Charles Finlay of Havana had advanced the theory that a mosquito conveyed the unknown cause of yellow fever, but did not succeed in demonstrating the truth of his theory.

Dr. H. R. Carter of the marine hospital service had written a paper showing that although the period of incubation was only five days, yet a house to which a patient was carried did not become infected for from 15 to 20 days.

To Reed's mind this indicated that the unknown infective agent has to undergo a period of incubation of from 10 to 15 days and probably in the body of the biting insect.

Up to this time the most generally accepted theory as to the causation of yellow fever was that of Sanarelli, who claimed that the bacillus icteroids discovered by him was the specific agent of the disease Maj. Reed, in association with Dr. Carroll, had, however, already demonstrated that this bacillus was one widely disseminated in the United States, and bore no such relation to yellow fever.

In June, July and August, 1900, the commission gave their entire attention to the bacteriological study of the blood of yellow fever patients and the postmortem examination of the organs of those dying of the disease. In 24 cases where the blood was repeatedly examined, as well as in 11 carefully studied autopsies, bacillus icteroids were not discovered, nor was there any indication of the presence in the blood of a specific cause of the disease.

Application was made to Gen. Leonard Wood, the military governor of Cuba, for permission to conduct experiments on nonimmune persons, and a liberal sum of money requested for the purpose of rewarding volunteers who would submit themselves to experiments.

Story of the Great Quest.

Money and full authority to proceed were promptly granted, and to the everlasting glory of the American soldier volunteers from the army offered themselves for experiment in plenty with the utmost fearlessness.

Before the arrangements were entirely completed Dr. Carroll, a member of the commission, allowed himself to be bitten by a mosquito that 12 days previously had filled itself with the blood of a yellow fever patient. He suffered from a very severe attack and his was the first experimental case. Dr. Lazear also experimented on himself at the same time, but was not infected. Some days later, while in the yellow fever ward, he was bitten by a mosquito and noted the fact carefully. He acquired the disease in its most terrible form and died a martyr to science and a true hero.

No other fatality occurred among the brave men who in the course of the experiments willingly exposed themselves to the infection of the dreaded disease.

A camp was especially constructed for the experiments about four miles from Havana, christened Camp Lazear in honor of the dead comrade. The inmates of the camp were put into most rigid quarantine and ample time was allowed to eliminate any possibility of the disease being brought from Havana.

The personnel consisted of three nurses and nine nonimmunes, all in the military service, and included two physicians.

From time to time Spanish immigrants, newly arrived, were brought in from the immigrant station; a person not known to be immune was not allowed to leave camp, or if he did was forbidden to return.

The most complete record was kept of the health of every man to be experimented upon, thus eliminating the possibility of any other disease than yellow fever complicating the case.

What the Experiments Proved.

Besides the experimental cases caused by mosquito bites, four nonimmunes were infected by injecting blood drawn directly from the veins of yellow fever patients in the first two days of the disease, thus demonstrating the presence of an infectious agent in the blood at this early period of the attack.

Even the blood serum of a patient, passed through a bacteria-proof filter, was found to be capable of causing yellow fever in another person.

The details of the experiments are most interesting, but it must here suffice to briefly sum up the principal conclusions of this admirable board of investigators of which Reed was the master mind:

"1. The specific agent in the causation of yellow fever exists in the blood of a patient for the first three days of his attack, after which time he ceases to be a menace to the health of others.

"2. A mosquito of a single species, stegomyia faciata, ingesting the blood of the patient during this infective period is powerless to convey the disease to another person by its bite until about 12 days have elapsed, but can do so thereafter for an indefinite period, probably during the remainder of its life.

"3. The disease cannot be spread in any other way than by the bite of the previously infected stegomyia. Articles used or soiled by patients do not carry infection."

These conclusions pointed so clearly to the practical method of exterminating the disease that they were at once accepted by the sanitary authorities in Cuba and put to the test in Havana, where for nearly a century and a half, by actual record, the disease had never failed to appear annually.

Yellow fever has ceased absolutely in Havana, though previously the number of deaths annually had rarely fallen below 300 and had often exceeded 1,000. The proof of the mosquito theory is regarded in scientific circles as making it certain that yellow fever has been conquered, and that it will never again get beyond control.

A WOMAN'S ORDEAL

DREADS DOCTOR'S QUESTIONS

Thousands Write to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., and Receive Valuable Advice Absolutely Confidential and Free

There can be no more terrible ordeal to a delicate, sensitive, refined woman than to be obliged to answer certain questions in regard to her private ills, even when those questions are asked by her family physician, and many continue to suffer rather than submit to examinations which so many physicians propose in order to intelligently treat the disease; and this is the reason why so many physicians fail to cure female disease.

This is also the reason why thousands upon thousands of women are corresponding with Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. To her they can confide every detail of their illness, and from her great knowledge, obtained from years of experience in treating female ills, Mrs. Pinkham can advise women more wisely than the local physician.

Read how Mrs. Pinkham helped Mrs. T. C. Willadsen, of Manning, Ia. She writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I can truly say that you have saved my life, and I cannot express my gratitude in words. Before I wrote to you telling you how I felt, I had doctored for over two years steady, and spent lots of money in medicines besides, but it all failed to do me any good. I had female trouble and would daily have fainting spells, backache, bearing-down pains, and my monthly periods were very irregular and finally ceased. I wrote to you for your advice and received a letter full of instructions just what to do, and also commenced to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I have been restored to perfect health. Had it not been for you I would have been in my grave to-day."

Mountains of proof establish the fact that no medicine in the world equals Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for restoring women's health.

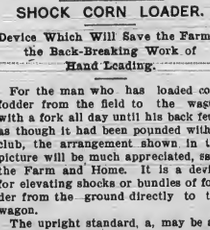
TO MANAGE KICKING COWS

Stall in Which They May Be Safely Milked, While at the Same Time Breaking Them of Habit.

Kicking is a fault common to young heifers the first few wekes after calving. If it is allowed to continue they soon learn to become habitual kickers, than which I know of nothing meaner as they will stand quietly until the last drops are being drawn, and then let drive at the pail, and really seem to enjoy the fun of doing it. Kicking at flies in summer is also as great a cause of kicking as rough milking. This should never be allowed.

A heifer's teats are very tender and she should always be milked very gently by the full hand, says the Farm and Home. The teat should never be jerked, or pulled as in "stripping," especially when the bag is full. Extreme gentleness in every way the first few weeks will usually make a gentle cow. Often the animal is timid and shrinks from being handled, and also resents interference with what she considers the sole rights of her calf.—In all cases of kicking I have one unfailing remedy, whether the cow is young, or an old habitual kicker.

Make a slatted stall just high enough so she can't jump out and wide enough to hold her comfortably with nothing to spare, narrower at the end where a feed box should be placed as high from the ground as is comfortable for her to eat out of. This slatted stall should be long enough to have cleats through which a bar or two should be run behind the cow to keep her from backing out, and also places to run a bar in front of her hind legs about the thick joint, or as high up as possible, so as not to interfere with milking. A hole about 18 or 20 inches wide is left open for this purpose from the ground up to the cow's flank, which allows easy and safe access to the udder, while the cleat, post, etc., prevent the cow from kicking outwardly at the milker, thus insuring safety to milk and milker.



This stall or break does not hurt the cow at all, but it teaches her to stand still, and also that she can't kick if she wanted to. Usually a few weeks' use of this break makes a gentle cow, especially if fed while she is being milked. Old kickers may always have to be milked in it, although I have broken several from kicking. They are usually good cows and can be bought cheap.

SHOCK CORN LOADER.

Device Which Will Save the Farmer the Back-Breaking Work of Hand Loading.

For the man who has loaded corn fodder from the field to the wagon with a fork all day until his back feels as though it had been pounded with a club, the arrangement shown in the picture will be much appreciated, says the Farm and Home. It is a device for elevating shocks or bundles of fodder from the ground directly to the wagon.

The upright standard, a, may be attached to wagon frame in the center or at the front or the hind end and braced in such a manner as will hold it rigid. The boom, b, is attached to a by an iron band or collar shown at d, so arranged that the boom may swing entirely around upright a, which may be secured to the bed of wagon by anchor chains or by setting into block as shown at c. The cable, e, is used to adjust the height of boom, elevating it to highest point in finishing out the load.

Care of Young Trees.

The young orchard needs looking after. If the trees were planted this summer, it is likely to need a little extra attention. The first summer is likely to test them severely. They are weak and need all their vitality to aid them in getting a good root system started. They should, of course, have had their tops severely cut back when they were set, but this may be done later if it were neglected at the proper time. Every useful branch is an extra tax on the tree that is so much waste.—Ohio Farmer.

The Real Problem.

It has never been a question of how to make a living on cheap fertile land. The real problem comes when a man tries to make a living on high-priced land out of which the fertility has been taken by exhaustive cropping.

Don't make the mistake of crowding your pasture grass too early.

Sixty pounds of good butter is worth 30 bushels of wheat to-day.

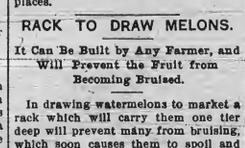
TOO LITTLE GOOD BUTTER

A Plea for Improvement of the Grade of the Farm-Made Product.

The consumption of butter is increased by the increase of the general quality. There is a general complaint that there is too little good butter on the market and too much poor butter. If this applies to creamery butter it applies much more to farm-made butter. The American public is always ready to pay for a product of good quality, but it turns away from a product of poor quality. This is so probably more in this country than in any other. No matter how poor the American may be he wants the best. Sometimes if he cannot pay for it he runs in debt for it rather than take a poorer quality, for which he could pay. This is so not only in the case of butter, but in the case of almost everything else. The result is that a poorly made product of any kind sells slowly even at a low price. The problem in this country is to manufacture good products, for those only can be marketed without loss.

When a man sends poor butter to market to be sold on commission he is taking big chances with it, says the Farmers' Review. As it is not a "quick sale," as the commission men say, it will be held in store longer than the other butter. Much of this time it is exposed to currents of air warmer than the required temperature of the refrigerators, for it must be often examined by possible buyers. The triers are run into it often and when the surface is covered with several signs of this kind the would-be buyers become suspicious of it, for they recognize the fact that other men have passed adverse opinions on it. It gets rancid in a short time and some of it has finally to be disposed of as grease.

COOL THE FRUIT.



Successful Shipment of Fruit Demands That It Should Be Freed from Latent Heat.

Fruit should not be picked on a warm day and put immediately into cold storage or into cars for shipment. It should be put into some place where it will have a chance to cool off and permit the latent heat to work out, says the Farmers' Review. Putting fruit into close cars where no refrigeration is provided is a fruitful source of trouble in the shipping of fruit. The heat in the fruit causes rapid spoiling, especially with fruit that is of short keeping quality, like some of the apples that ripen in the summer. If the nights are cool, fruit can be cooled off by simply leaving it over night exposed to the air, but not to the dew. In other cases cellars are found deep enough to have a temperature of under 60 degrees. These can be used in such cases. In some parts of the territory over which this paper circulates storage pits have been dug into the side hills and these may be used as storage places.

RACK TO DRAW MELONS.

It Can Be Built by Any Farmer, and Will Prevent the Fruit from Becoming Bruised.

In drawing watermelons to market a rack which will carry them one tier deep will prevent many from bruising, which soon causes them to spoil and turn sour. A handy rack like that shown in the cut is used by H. A. Halbert, a celebrated Texas melon grower. It can be made, says the Farm and Home, by any farmer at a cost of two two three dollars. Use strips one by four inches, 12 to 14 feet long. If a set of bolster springs are used under the rack the melons will carry perfectly. If no springs are used put a thick layer of straw under the melons.

THE ORCHARD.

The wise orchardist will look carefully for tent caterpillars. When found, the quick use of a torch is an excellent remedy.

Cultivate the orchard every ten days, this month; thus conserving the moisture in the soil. Constant cultivation during a dry time is almost as good as irrigation.

Again we say: Be sure to muzzle the horses—yes, and the whiffletrees, too—when harrowing the orchard. Barked trees are as disagreeable on the farm as barking dogs.

The time to cut out blighted pear wood is to-day, to-morrow—any time 'tis seen. Watch for signs of this disease, and, when found, be sure to cut well below the affected part.

There is a temptation to make sauce of the early apples before they are really fit. Do not be in a hurry about it. Better wait a few days longer, than to run the risk of an attack of bowel trouble.

Selecting the Wheat Variety.

The farmer that grows wheat can no longer afford to ignore the improvements that have been made in the selection of varieties. Some of these will yield five or ten bushels more per acre than others, under the same conditions.

Does your churn smell as sweet as the new-mown hay after you have made ready to set away after using? Don't be satisfied to let it go if it does not. Nice butter depends on just such little thing as this.

FOR CONGRESS TO DECIDE

Foreign Countries Establish Prohibitive Rates by Way of Tariff Retaliation.

The urgent need of action by congress on the tariff will at once be seen when it is considered that the foreign market for our surplus agricultural products is at stake. Germany and other European countries have imposed a tariff to prohibit, as far as possible, American products being imported there in retaliation for our tariff, which excludes most of the products of those countries. The new German tariff will take effect in March, 1906, and the rates have without exception been increased on every line of exports from this country. On corn the German tariff has been increased to 40 cents a bushel, and other cereals and provisions in proportion. These prohibitive rates will greatly reduce the market for the surplus of our agricultural products, and when our crops are good and this country has a large surplus to dispose of, it will certainly affect the home price of those products.

The United States, like all countries that have a surplus of any product to sell, has to seek a foreign market for it and sell it in competition with the surplus of other countries, and the price for such surplus product in those foreign markets fixes the price for the whole of the product at home. We have been exceedingly fortunate for the past one or two years in having fair crops when Europe had lean ones, and that gave us an opportunity to reverse the usual order of things and demand a good price for our surplus. But that cannot be expected to continue, and when this year or next there are good crops the world over, down will tumble the price to what the countries, like England, who do not raise enough to supply their own people, will pay. Then, being shut out from most of the European countries by their high or prohibitive tariff, it will leave us but those low tariff or free trade countries like England to sell our surplus to, and the price they will pay us will be fixed there in competition with all the countries, who have, like us, a surplus to sell.

That will give England cheap food and allow her workmen, as they have in the past, to live better on less wages in proportion than any other country. It must also result in the increased price of such agricultural products in Germany, and if long continued the wages of her workmen must be raised to meet the advanced cost of food.

Who will first call a halt in this economic war is a question. Our protected industries are protesting that the present tariff rates are none too high. They, of course, do not want either German products or those of any other country to come in and compete with them. The higher the cost of living here the more profit for those who have a monopoly, like the trusts have, of supplying our people. The farmer, the workingman and the middle class generally must in the meantime see the cost of living advance without a similar increase in the money they earn to pay it.

The reciprocity treaties, or the maximum or minimum tariff, that some republicans are proposing will only help those industries who now find themselves likely to lose the chance to sell their surplus products to foreign countries, and some of those must be content to see part of the profit they have been charging go to the reciprocity hopper, so that others may benefit by the reduced tariff of the country with whom the reciprocity treaty is made. This reciprocity plan, or the maximum and minimum system, is not intended to reduce prices, but to open a partial market abroad for our surplus manufactures. The trusts will still charge all the consumers can pay, for they will still have a monopoly of the home market. Nor will these plans of tariff tinkering add much to the revenues of the government.

The only tariff reform that will reduce the present high trust prices is to so reduce the tariff rates on those trust products that they are selling cheaper abroad than here, that our own people can buy at the same price as the foreigners. It will be interesting to watch the republican majority in the coming congress and notice if they favor the trusts or the people.

——The Philadelphia police have detected over 31,000 fraudulent names registered as voters, all of which were faithfully recorded for the republican ticket. But that is not the worst of it, for it is stated that this large number is less than half of the false registration in that city.

——There is one thing certain. The people will smell a mouse whenever a drawer of the bureau of agriculture is opened as long as the drawers have sectional politics in them. Paternalism and socialism are quite bad enough when they are not mixed with party or sectional politics and grafting. ——Secretary Wilson's declaration that his department is "mainly sound" reminds us of the lawyer who, being fond of adverbs, declared to a jury that his client, who had been badly damaged by some of the testimony in the case, was "a virtually chaste woman." Nevertheless, the jury rendered a verdict of guilty.—Hartford Times (Ind.).

Named for Saint.

Certain birds get their names from St. Peter. According to a writer: "The petrel (in German 'Petersvogel,' Peter's bird), a bird that skims the waves, is named after the apostle who walked upon the waves of Galilee. But the parrot's is a less simple case. In Spain and in Portugal, as in France, the word corresponding to 'parrot' almost certainly represents 'little Peter'—a familiar name playfully applied because Peter was so common a Christian name. Similarly a house sparrow is nicknamed 'pierrot' in France."

A Kansas teacher had been flatly contradicted by one of her pupils. "Don't you know it's wrong to contradict your teacher?" she asked, and then turned to her pupils and said: "What does it mean when anybody contradicts you?" The red-headed boy in the back part of the room promptly replied: "Why, it means that its up to you."

Doctors at Sea.

A little girl in Denver, four years old, swallowed a nail. It lodged in the lower part of the left lung. Since then the doctors have been treating her for pneumonia and bronchitis and would not believe the little sufferer's story of the nail. Finally an abscess formed and when it broke the nail was coughed up.

ARE YOUR KIDNEYS WEAK?

Thousands of Men and Women Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It.

To Prove What the Great Kidney Remedy, Swamp-Root, Will Do for YOU, Every Reader of This Paper May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Absolutely Free by Mail.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the great kidney remedy, Dr Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys begin to get better they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

Didn't Know I Had Kidney Trouble

I had tried so many remedies without their having benefited me that I was about discouraged but in a few days after taking your wonderful Swamp-Root I began to feel better.

I was out of health and run down generally; had no appetite, was dizzy and suffered with headache most of the time. I did not know that my kidneys were the cause of my trouble, but somehow felt they might be, and I began taking Swamp-Root, as above stated. There is such a pleasant taste to Swamp-Root, and it goes right to the spot and drives disease out of the system. It has cured me, making me stronger and better in every way, and I cheerfully recommend it to all sufferers.

Gratefully yours,

MRS. A. L. WALKER, 231 East Linden St., Atlanta, Ga.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for many kinds of diseases, and if permitted to continue much suffering and fatal results are sure to follow Kidney trouble irritates the nerves, makes you dizzy, restless, sleepless and irritable. Makes you pass water often during the day and obliges you to get up many times during the night. Unhealthy kidneys cause rheumatism, gravel, catarrh of the bladder, pain or dull ache in the back, joints and muscles; make your head ache and back ache, cause indigestion, stomach and liver trouble, you get a sallow, yellow complexion, make you feel as though you had heart trouble; you may have plenty of ambition, but no strength; get weak .. Swamp-Root.

The cure for these troubles is Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the world-famous kidney remedy. In taking Swamp-Root you afford natural help to Nature, for Swamp-Root is the most perfect healer and gentle aid to the kidneys that is known to medical science.

(Swamp-Root is pleasant to take.)

How to Find Out

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.—So successful is Swamp-Root in promptly curing even the most distressing cases, that to prove its wonderful merits you may have a sample bottle and a book of valuable information, both sent absolutely free by mail. The book contains many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured. The value and success of Swamp-Root is so well known that our readers are advised to send for a sample bottle.

In writing to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., be sure to say that you read this generous offer in this paper.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name,

Dr. Melvin M. Page, Page Optical Co., Erie, Pa., writes: "Taking too many iced drinks in New York in 1895 sent me home with a terrible attack of kidney trouble. I had acute congestion, sharp pain in the back, headaches and attacks of dizziness. My eyes gave out, and with the languor and sleeplessness of the disease upon me I wasted from 194 to 122 pounds. At the time I started using Doan's Kidney Pills an abscess was forming on my right kidney. The trouble was quickly checked, however, and the treatment cured me, so that I have been well since 1896 and weigh 188 pounds."

B. F. Corbin Passes Away.

B. F. Corbin died at his home in Kansas City, Mo., July 12, 1905, of apoplexy which he received two days before. Every member of the family were at his bedside at the time he died. He had exceeded the Biblical allotment of life—three score and ten years—by two days. Mr. Corbin was born in Virginia, July 10, 1835, and when he was quite young his parents moved to Kentucky, where he grew to manhood. In 1877 he moved to Illinois where he remained two years, and then moved to Williamson, Iowa. In 1880 he returned to this county to assist in taking care of his aged parents, after whose death he went back to Williamson, Iowa, where he remained until last November when he moved to Kansas City, Missouri to give his family better social, educational and business advantages. He was the first Mayor of Williamson and filled the office the five subsequent terms, and was a justice of the peace for 17 years. He was a man of splendid information and filled the offices to which he was elected with wisdom, ability, fairness and dignity. He was the most popular citizen in his county, which made his election to office easy although he was a Democrat and his county largely Republican. He was a gallant soldier in the Confederate army in the civil war. The loss of such a man in any community is irreparable. The Williamson Iowa, Wasp, of July 19th, contains a two column notice of his death and a testimonial to his great worth and public spirit.

Of Mr. Corbin the Wasp says: "It is indeed sad beyond expression to be compelled by the hand of fate to chronical the death of any individual but even more so the departure of a worthy pioneer who by a life long career of usefulness and fidelity has given life and stability to a town and community. Such was the life of him whose death we mourn today. Eager in the interests of every public good, keen to see the necessity arising for permanent improvements in various lines, he has frequently been called to fill positions of honor and trust which do not fall to the lot of every man, and wherein he has ever fully exemplified, in a satisfactory manner, his true genuine worth and executive capability. Like all other men who have ever figured conspicuously in the great drama of life and made a success of their untiring efforts, he too possessed rare traits of character, peculiar only to himself, which developed his inherent powers and made him strong for the duties of life. Liberal and fair minded in his views of life and his surroundings, honest and honorable in all his dealings with his fellowmen, genial in manner and kind in disposition, he had the good fortune to win for himself a host of warm hearted and admiring friends, who bowed their heads in sorrow submissive as his bier was borne to the 'Silent City of the dead.' He was always a hard working, sober and industrious man, of frugal habits, ordinarily successful in the business enterprises of life in which he engaged and succeeded in accummulating for his family a comfortable competence for life."

The following from an exchange is a sample of the reports that come in from every part of Kentucky: "The rains of the past week have precluded any possibility of a failure of the corn crop. The stalks are bending under the weight of big ears and the prospects are that every crib will be filled to running over when the harvest time comes."

A man needs something besides faith in God when he tackles a hornet's nest.

BATTLE AT CYNTHIANA.

To the Editor of the Recorder:

Our loss was 22 killed and 38 wounded; that of Morgan was 25 killed and 78 wounded. Several of his wounded died on his way to Paris and Richmond. Col. Landram reached Paris that night and joined his regiment and the command under General Green Clay Smith. Col. Morgan left Cynthiana early the night of the 17th and arrived at Paris on the morning of the 18th and immediately attacked the Union forces under Smith numbering about 2,500 men, and after a spirited conflict of a few hours which was uncomfortably warm for the Colonel he drew his forces off for Richmond and Winchester, where he was pursued by General Smith and the 18th Ky. under the gallant Landram. We were furnished transportation and ordered to Camp Chase, Ohio, to await an exchange. The people of Columbus, and especially the soldiers of two or three new regiments that were being recruited there, shied around us as if we were so many wild animals that had escaped from some menagerie down South. They could not understand how we could be Union soldiers and come from Kentucky. They regarded us as rebels and thought we ought to be put in the bull pen with some other confederate prisoners they had there, and told us so. They taunted us about being whipped and captured by the notorious guerrilla Morgan. They were ordered to the front and struck Kentucky just in time to run up against the Big Hill and General Kirby Smith at the battle of Richmond, and returned to Columbus a sorry set, looking very much like Bill Nye's Sunday hat after it had passed through the threshing machine and been beat out with a soot bag. The tables were now turned and we had the last laugh which is generally the best. One of our red tape, feather bed Generals (for we had such—they come as a necessity born with all wars) came and wanted to send us west to fight the Indians, and as our paroles prohibited the use of fire-arms before we were exchanged, we objected, and after some lively times, loud talk and many threats he gave the scheme up in disgust and went off at something else less dangerous, more profitable and better suited to his calling—the writing of Ben Hur—and we were exchanged and returned to duty at Lexington, Ky. Kentucky has never received her full share of the credit for the part she acted and the service she rendered the Federal Government during the Civil War. The impression had gone out and was pretty well circulated—especially in the extreme Northern States—that Kentucky was a rebel State and did not furnish a soldier for the Union army, and many are living who know no better yet. A few years ago in Cincinnati, at the reunion of that grand and noble organization, the Grand Army of the Republic, of which every soldier who volunteered for one year or more, and was honorably mustered in and honorably mustered out of the United States service, should become a member, a comrade came to me almost entirely obscured by badges, conceit and self-importance, noticing my button, and after the customary salute, asked what regiment I belonged to, and came near falling off his horse when I answered, the 18th Ky. "Then you were in the rebel army!" he said. I answered no, the Union army, and he replied "I did not know that Kentucky furnished any men for the Government." Being somewhat amused and the least bit inquisitive I asked to what regiment he belonged and he told me. How long were you in the service? I asked, and he replied "I enlisted for ninety days but did not serve my time out before the war closed." Now I know it was cruel but I could not keep still and I fired several questions at him like these: Do you draw a pension? He answered "Yes, I get a small one." How much? I asked, and he replied that he only received $24 per month. What are you pensioned for—noticing his robust condition?—and he replied, "For deafness." Now we had been talking in an ordinary tone and I had not noticed that defect; for he had not missed any questions or failed to make proper answers. We were standing near a saloon and I asked almost in a whisper, "Will you take something?" and he answered readily that he did not drink very often (he was half drunk then) but would not care to take one now. Now I have too much respect for the State of Vermont to tell where this man came from, but I will say that he must have belonged to the citizen soldiers who stood away back in the rear while the war was going on and would raise their heads occasionally and cautiously from their place of concealment and shout across six or seven States words of encouragement to the brave boys at the front; and when the battle was over, the smoke had cleared away, and the danger passed (scenting perhaps a pension afar off) came boldly forward and suffered themselves punched into the army for ninety days, at the point of a bayonet, and kept there by a special detail required for that purpose, and the most of the time that they were not in the hospitals, they were going to and coming from them, and when the end came—being well equipped with medical evidence—raised the holy howl, and are today happily situated behind comfortable pensions, being paid for something they were compelled to or did not do, while the soldier actuated by the lofty spirit of patriotism, volunteered in good faith and stayed behind the gun and fought the battle, and in many instances incurred ailments and disabilities rendering them unfit for service or citizenship, and incapable of making an honest living, in the absence of necessary evidence are required to take out a miserable existence with a pitiful sum barely sufficient to keep the wolf from the door. With due respect to the soldiers of all the States for everything considered, the result shows that all must have been busy; we were not chasing the heathen with his bow and arrow over the knobs of the Philippines with our modern "Mauser," but we were fighting an armed foe as brave and as true as ever pulled a trigger, but the facts are that Kentucky, with her apparent interests and sympathies divided, furnished sixty-two full regiments for the Union army, and there was scarcely a battle of any note fought during the Civil War that her chivalry and prowess were not felt, and oftimes became noticable and conspicuous. And knowing these things as I do, I feel justified in saying that her absence from the army would have been felt in the final result, and that General Grant and General Lee and last, but not least, our gallant Col. Landram could have taken those sixty-two regiments of fightning Kentuckians and wiped the kingdom of Spain off of the map any morning before breakfast. Colonel Metcalf, of the 7th Ky. Cavalry, returned to Cynthiana bravely a few days later and levied an assessment upon the citizens of Cynthiana and Harrison county for the purpose of raising means to reimburse the fire department of Cincinnati for the loss of their horses, and some thoughtless wretch had the impudence to ask me a few years afterwards what I supposed Col. Metcalf done with all of the money he collected there for that purpose and I told him if the Colonel was yet living, and was so inclined, he could perhaps best answer that question himself, and while he was at it, he might explain why he was not here on the 17th to assist in protecting those horses and other property. But perhaps the Col. had business elsewhere on that day. Since those days forty long years have gone by on the wheels of time. And in their passing have come many changes to those times and scenes; many of the actors and participants of '62-5 have passed over the line in repose to the last final roll call and others are fast following; the grass of several summers kissed into existence by the gentle dews of heaven, have come and gone over the grave of our gallant Colonel; all lines giving cause for controversy, contention and strife have been obliterated, and we have today a united country with one common mutual interest, being all ours from shore to shore, from north to south, from east to west; with no blue, no gray, but bound and sealed by the holy bonds of self-respect, national pride and soldiery love. Whether right or wrong is not for you nor I to say, it is enough for us to know that the responsibility is never with the man behind the gun, for like the church usher he only goes forward to prepare the way to ease and comfort those who follow.

From present talk there will be another exodus of tenants from here to Indiana, next spring.

Tobacco has grown to such immense proportions that there will be a great shortage of sticks and house room.

The 20th day of this month will be long remembered by N. S. Bristow. On that day Mrs. Bristow gave him the greatest surprise of his life, perhaps. Early in the morning a friend called at their home to inform Napolean of some important matter needing attention in the neighborhood, in this way disarming suspicion and getting him away for two or three hours. Upon his return 48 relatives and friends had gathered, as by magic, to greet him and wish him health, happiness and joy, at the same time notifying him that it was his 56th birthday. The methods Mrs. Bristow had adopted to bring about the surprise were so unique that Mr. Bristow and all present admitted she was master of the art, bowed gracefully to her prestage and immediately turned their attention to enjoyment and pleasure, which lasted through the entire day. Many handsome presents were given. The only thing that marred the day's enjoyment was the absence of Mr. Anayinm Bristow, the oldest member of the Bristow family, whose health was such as to prevent his being present. The company was composed of relatives and friends from Covington, Newport, Erlanger, Georgetown and Union.

BELLEVIEW.

The funeral of Joseph Riddell, who died on the 21st inst., was conducted by Rev. Edgar Riley at the Christian Church here on the 23d in the presence of a large number of the friends of the deceased. The oration was most excellent and appropriate. At the conclusion of his remarks the minister read the following: "The deceased was born December 23d, 1829, in Boone county, and died August 21, 1906, aged 75 years, 8 months and 28 days. He spent his life in this county, and became a member of the Masonic Order nearly fifty years ago."

At the conclusion of the religious exercises the Masons took charge of the remains and according to the ceremony of the Order, consigned them to their last resting place in the new cemetery near town. Joseph Riddell was honored and esteemed by all who knew him. He was faithful in every walk of life as a husband, father, citizen, and always ready to assist the needy. He is now on the banks of the River Jordan, waiting and watching to welcome his beloved wife and children to that land where none but the pure in spirit dwell, and nights of sorrow and affliction are unknown, because Christ the resurrected one is the light.

On October 27, 1861, Joseph Riddell and Eliza Marshall were united in marriage. To them were born two daughters, both of whom, with their mother survive him. The entire community sympathizes with the bereaved family.

The pallbearers were Dudley Ronse, G. G. Hughes, C. W. Riley, George L. Smith, G. M. Allen, W. W. Grimsley.

ERLANGER.

Aug. 29.—Andy Sheben, proprietor of the Sheben House at this place, sustained a considerable loss yesterday. He is the owner of quite a promising young horse, with which he has captured several premiums at the fairs, this season, and will endeavor to repeat the performance in several rings at Florence, this week, and with that in view he took the horse to the fair grounds yesterday to acquaint it with the exhibition ring. Andy's driving was witnessed by quite a number of persons, among them several negroes. In one of Andy's hip pockets was a wallet that contained $150 in money. This slipped out and was picked up by a white fellow in the presence of a negro boy to whom he gave $7 to keep mum, and then taking the balance of the money out he threw the wallet away. Soon after Sheben missed his money it was discovered that the boy had part of it and he was taken into custody, when he returned the money that was given to him, and told who had the remainder. The fellow who got the money left for parts unknown immediately and had disappeared two hours before Sheben had missed his money. Sheben hastened to Cincinnati, hoping to succeed in having the thief intercepted, but had not been successful at last accounts.

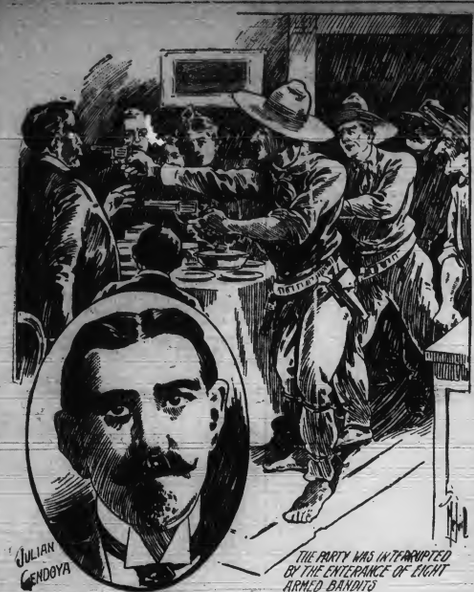
There is a division among the farmers as to what corn will be worth this fall at gathering-time. Some contend that it will not be worth less than 45 cents a bushel, while there are others who think 30 cents will be the prevailing price. The farmer is better off in this part of the country when corn is worth only 30 cents a bushel than he is when it brings 50 to 60 cents.

The last report from the fair grounds at Florence, yesterday, was that everything was in excellent shape for the fair, and that there is no mistake but what the 10th annual fair of the North Kentucky Agricultural Association will be the best in the history of the Association. An unusual quantity of fine stock, sheep, cattle and horses is assered, and the competition throughout the four days will be lively.



Yesterday was an ideal day for a sale and a tremendous crowd assembled to witness the sale of the property of the late J. J. Lillard on the farm four miles south of Burlington. Large delegations from Ohio, Indiana, and several of the neighboring counties in the state, were present, the result of having the occasion thoroughly advertised in the local papers.

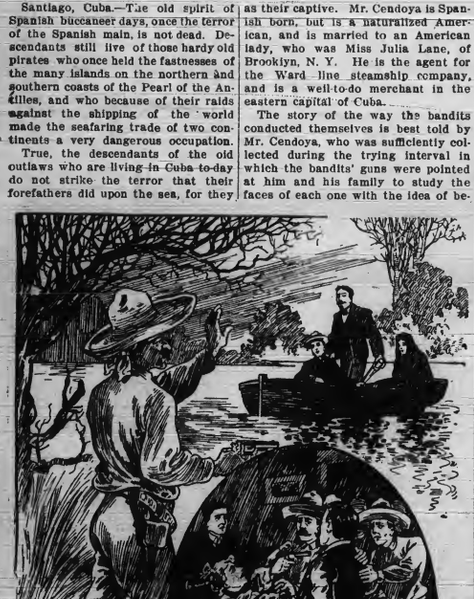
The farm which is supposed to contain 350 acres brought $35 per acre. Mrs. Mary Johnson, who was a sister of J. J. Lillard, being the purchaser.

Farmers and Traders bank stock, of Covington, brought from $228 to $229½ per share.

Boone County Deposit Bank stock, of Burlington, brought from $221 to $224 per share.

At noon the crowd was treated to burgoo of excellent quality, and the sale proceeded with renewed vigor after the appetites, that are always healthy at a sale, were satisfied.

CUBAN BRIGANDS RAID HOME OF AN AMERICAN CITIZEN



COMPEL HIM AT POINT OF GUNS TO PAY RANSOM TO AVOID CAPTURE AND POSSIBLE DEATH.

OLD SPIRIT OF SPANISH BUCCANEER DAYS.

Daring Outrage Perpetrated at Santiago—Desperate Gang Demand $30,000 of Mr. Julian Cendoya, a Prosperous Merchant, But Finally Accept $2,000—Leader Captured Later.

Santiago, Cuba.—The old spirit of Spanish buccaneer days, once the terror of the Spanish main, is not dead. Descendants still live of those hardy old pirates who once held the fastnesses of the many islands on the northern and southern coasts of the Pearl of the Antilles, and who because of their raids against the shipping of the world made the seafaring trade of two continents a very dangerous occupation.

True, the descendants of the old outlaws who are living in Cuba to-day do not strike the terror that their forefathers did upon the sea, for they are mere bunglers compared with them.

The advance of civilization has made the pirate's trade upon the sea unpopular. This has reduced those in whom the old spirit still lives to work in the mines of the island as day laborers, just as the haughty old Castilian used to oppress the poor native West Indian.

That the old spirit still lives in Cuba was shown most forcibly to Mr. Julian Cendoya on Sunday, July 9, when he was seated at his table with his family and two cousins enjoying his midday meal. The party was interrupted by the entrance of eight armed men, who demanded that Cendoya deliver to them $30,000, or so with them as their captive. Mr. Cendoya is Spanish born, but is a naturalized American, and is married to an American lady, who was Miss Julia Lane, of Brooklyn, N. Y. He is the agent for the Ward line steamship company, and is a well-to-do merchant in the eastern capital of Cuba.

The story of the way the bandits conducted themselves is best told by Mr. Cendoya, who was sufficiently collected during the trying interval in which the bandits' guns were pointed at him and his family to study the faces of each one with the idea of being able to identify them later. His presence of mind has already stood him in good stead, because he has since picked out the leader of the band, who has confessed to the crime.

"The outrage was perpetrated upon me," said Mr. Cendoya, "about seven o'clock Sunday evening. I was seated at the table with my wife and three children and two cousins. The meal was just about completed, and my servant, Thompson, was bringing in the tea, when as he came in the door there entered behind him five men armed with machetes, revolvers and rifles. Before I could exclaim the leader called out: 'Quietos todos' (Every one keep quiet').

"The leader of the party advanced toward me, pointing two revolvers at my breast, while the rest of the party covered with their weapons the rest of the family. The chief, who wore smoked glasses, and whose face I was trying to study, as I was sure I had seen him before, ordered that I deliver to him all the arms I had in the house. I gave him a shotgun, a target rifle, a Mauser and another rifle.

"On delivering all of my arms the chief gave me a letter, which he snatched from me as soon as I had read it. To the best of my memory the letter read as follows:

"'Eight men tired of life ask of you $30,000.
(Signed)
"'ONE-EYED MAN OF SANABRIA.'

"With all the calmness that I could summon I answered: 'You men do not know what $30,000 is, and undoubtedly you do not know that I am but a modest merchant when you ask such a large amount of money. I absolutely haven't that amount, and you can do what you please. I am at your service.'

"At these words from me the chief appeared to be reflecting, but finally he said: 'Pues vcuga con nosotros' (Then come with us).

"On seeing me reach for my hat, my wife and children and cousins, who had sat throughout the trying scene up to that time as if they had been petrified, suddenly found their voices at seeing me about to be taken away from them, and they fell on their knees crying to the bandits not to take me away, and for me to satisfy their demand with what money I could. You can imagine how desperate I felt at being myself so powerless to allay the grief of my family.

"We were on the point of leaving when the chief hesitated a moment and gave a signal with a whistle which he had tied about his neck. At the signal three more men appeared, and all withdrew to one side, where they exchanged some sentences, the import of which I could not make out.

"When the bandits had finished talking the pleadings and tears of my wife and children determined me to make some effort to satisfy the villains, for I feared they might attempt violence to my family. I perceived that they were men who would stoop to anything, and the possibilities to my family if I did not satisfy their thirst for money filled me with dread. I offered the chief $2,000, which I told him was all the money I could possibly obtain in cash. One of the bandits exclaimed:

"'Such a sum means only trouble for eight men to bother themselves with.'

"The chief then said:

"'Give us a little more, and we will leave you in peace.'

"'Impossible,' I replied; 'this is the last cent I can get, and if it does not satisfy you I will have to go with you.'

"'Very well,' replied the chief; 'we will take the money, but you must give us some guarantee that you will deliver the money.'

"At this my 15-year-old boy spoke up and said:

"'My father's word is sacred.'

"The bandits held another conference, and then it was that I recognized one of them as a drunken Spaniard named Pineiro, whom I had seen around for years. Finally the chief returned to me and said that they had decided to accept the $2,000, and I was instructed to go in a boat with my wife and oldest son the next day at 11 o'clock in the morning to a swamp called Cojimar, where they would be awaiting me. Death was threatened the family if I mentioned the metter to the police or brought anyone armed with me when I delivered the money.

"Then the men backed out of the house and quickly disappeared. I immediately went out on the porch to see where they had gone. I then called my servants, and found that the bandits had locked them up in the kitchen.

"The next day I took my entire family and went from my pretty little summer home across the bay from Santiago to the city. It is needless to tell you of the sleepless night we spent while waiting for the dawn. But with the coming of the day our spirits rose, and we went to the city with lighter hearts. I secured the money, and with my wife and oldest son we took a small launch and went to the Cojimar swamp. As we neared the shore we saw some one signaling to us and approached as near as possible. The man whom I recognized as the chief of the night before waded out to us, and to him I delivered the money. As he took the money my wife exclaimed:

"'Now you have money. Don't come back.' To this the chief replied:

"'No tenga cuidado, senora.' 'Don't worry, senora.'"

Mr. Cendoya on returning to the city notified the police. He had recognized the man Pineiro, and the police lost no time in hunting for him. They finally found him. A search of his clothes revealed but a few cents, but a search of the place where he was stopping uncovered a little over $200. Under the severe cross-examination of the police he broke down and admitted that he was one of the robbers, and that he was with the man who waded out and received the money from Mr. Cendoya.

No amount of persuasion or threats could, however, induce him to tell who his accomplices were or where they could be found. He says he does not know who the other parties with him were. He also claims that he had no gun when he called on Mr. Cendoya, although a revolver was found on his person when he was arrested. The gun he says he bought after the robbery. The police believe that the confession of the man will be followed by still further weakening, and that the rest of the band will be secured soon.

A Spaniard was arrested on the 15th just as he was about to embark for New York, and Julian Cendoya, Jr., declared that he was one of the bandits, but the senior Cendoya and another brother disagreed, and the man was released. Pineiro was positively identified by the three male Cendoyas, each picking him out of a row of six Spaniards. This was the cause of Pineiro's breakdown. Pineiro formerly sold brass and copper to Mr. Cendoya's business house, he having secured the metal from the wrecked Spanish warships outside the harbor of Santiago. During the hold-up he appeared partly intoxicated, as he flourished his revolver wildly about his head, and took particular delight in terrifying nearly to death Thompson, the negro American butler of Mr. Cendoya.

All of the bandits are believed to be workers in the copper mines of El Cobre, near Santiago.

The question was asked of James E. Ward & Co. if the firm would pay any part of money thus obtained from their Santiago agent. The answer was:

"No; there is no reason why we should. It was a personel matter between the agent and the robbers. We have nothing to do with it, and do not figure in the affair in any way."

ISLAND THAT IS AN EDEN.

Community Has More of Life's Comforts and Less of Its Worries Than Any Other.

The maps of the United States coast survey show a long, narrow strip of land on the border line between Penobscot bay and the Atlantic ocean. It is known on the charts as Ragged Island, but sentimental summer residents have named it Crie Haven, in honor of old John Crie, a bearded Scotchman who settled there among the rocks more than half a century ago. The regular all the year residents now number 42, but in July and August, when the vacation tourists invade the place, there are often from 80 to 100 persons living among the rocks and taking on heavy coats of tan from the fresh sea breezes.

Students of social problems say that residents of this community have more of the real comforts of life and less of life's worries than any other people on the globe. The island is under no form of government, and, though it is a part of the state of Maine, the people pay no taxes and have no officers of any kind. There is not a rat or a mouse in all of its mile and a half of ledge width. There are no bugs in the beds, no roaches in the pantries, no cats or dogs behind the stoves, and no mosquitoes in the fresh pools of crystal water. The island has no church in which to worship and no clergyman to tell the people whether they are doing right or wrong.

No lawyer ever resided there, and no sheriff or constable ever went to issue summons or to serve processes. A kindly doctor, who lives in Rockland, is the only physician who makes professional visits to the place, and he is told to come by carrier pigeons, which fly to the mainland faster than any steamboat can take the message. As soon as the physician receives a call he liberates a pigeon from his loft, which bears a message, telling when to send a boat to meet him at Matinicus, so that there may be no delay.

There are eight cows and three horses on the island, but not a mile of road for them to travel in. The horses are used for hauling up boats, and the cows give milk for visitors. Everybody walks by well worn footpaths, which were originally laid out by the cows while seeking fresh feed among the bowlders. A summer visitor brought on a bicycle last season, but she could not use it and the wheel was sent back to Boston. The chief and practically the only occupation of the residents is catching lobsters in pots covered with netting. Every person tries to capture enough every day to bring three dollars, which is easily done when lobsters are sold to the steamers for 10 and 15 cents a pound. As it takes only about two hours to tend the lobster pots the islanders spend the rest of their time in building boats, whittling driftwood, and eating lobsters which are too short to sell.

John Ericson, a gigantic Swede, is the only celebrated man on the island. He is six feet tall, weighs 234 pounds, and everybody believes him to be the most powerful man on earth. They talk by the hour about his feats of strength. Last summer when the new iron keel for Capt. Jones' sloop yacht came to the island by steamer and was put out on the wharf, men went to catch the horses to haul the heavy length of iron up the pier and around to the yard. While they were away Ericson shouldered the keel and did not put it down until he had placed it under the bottom of the yacht. The distance was 600 feet, and the weight of the keel 1,040 pounds. A son of Ericson's, John, Jr., went to school until he weighed more than the five other pupils combined, and finished his education at the age of 15. He then tipped the scales at 212 pounds. If the Ericsons knew how to box, Marvin Hart couldn't hold the heavy-weight title long enough to get acquainted with it.

Distinction of Terms.

CEMENT FLOOR FOR LIQUIDS

How a Serviceable One Can Be Laid Right Over the Planking and Great Saving Made.

The cut shows the arrangement of a cement floor laid over an ordinary board floor that will save all of the liquid manure, the waste of which is one of the dairyman's greatest losses, says the Farm and Home. Cement is laid directly on the floor. Slope the cement back to the point a, from the manger, c, and from there let the surface rise again back to the rear wall. Bed the floor planks, b, of the stall directly in the wet cement and pour very thin cement over the top that all cracks may be filled. By placing such material as is used for absorbents at the point, a, all liquids will be taken up and saved.

FEEDING SHEEP TO MARKET

The Too Liberal Use of Grain Makes the Margin of Profit Too Small.

The man who uses grain to put all or nearly all the gain of flesh on any kind of stock fed for market will not realize any great margin of profit. Every farmer knows that grass is the cheapest and usually the best feed for making growth and flesh. The most money I have made feeding sheep has been done by depending on grass for the most part in putting on flesh.

A few years ago, says E. P. Snyder, of Huron county, O., in writing to the Ohio Farmer, when sheep were very cheap, I had 50 fine wooled wethers that I offered for sale, just at the beginning of winter. They were in good condition, but the most the buyers would offer was $2.50 per head. Hay was a light crop, corn was scarce and high; I expected to have to buy both before spring, but felt that I ought not to sacrifice so much on the sheep. I had a large stack of wheat straw and by feeding this straw liberally once a day, and hay or cornstalks for the other feed, with a light feed of corn—one-half pint each per day—I brought them through in very good shape. They were sheared and put on grass and it was remarkable what gains they made right from the start. They sheared a little over 10 pounds each, which sold at 25 cents per pound, so that the wool brought as much as was offered for the sheep in the fall. They were sold on the 20th of June at $4.50 per cwt., and they weighed 101 pounds each. This was a good profit for their feed and care, but the most of the gain was made on grass.

This spring I sold my wether lambs at six cents, clipped, to go about June 1. They were clipped April 4 and the 40 head turned on a timothy meadow of eight acres, April 22. Their grain feed was continued for two weeks and then gradually diminished till for the last four weeks they had none at all. They were at no time on full feed, just kept in a thriving condition. They put on flesh rapidly as soon as turned on grass. I offered these lambs for sale in the fall at $3 per head. Buyers thought them too small for the money. The lambs and wool brought me $7.30 each.

My sheep are high grade Merinos. It pays me to keep them through the winter in thrifty condition, and, after getting their fleece, depend on grass to put on the flesh. I know that with rather large, coarse wooled, light shearing lambs, it usually pays better to crowd them with grain from late fall or early winter and sell in January or February with the fleeces on. One can't always pasture a meadow without loss, but in this case it was a decided advantage. The season has been so wet that the grass has made a wonderful growth and the pasturing delayed the ripening so it will be just right after all the other meadows are cared for. The yield will be nearly or quite two tons per acre of clean timothy. The sheep cleaned up the weeds completely, especially the white top.

Pays to Raise Colts.

It will pay any farmer to raise one or two colts of the draft type each season, declares the Farmers' Voice. Breed the mares to heavy sires, and those of the colts that mature above 1,300 pounds should be disposed of and the lighter ones retained for farm use. Horses of the heavy type are and will be in good demand at remunerative prices for years to come.

A Whistle on the Farm.

Around a farm or large place the use of a whistle is quite necessary to call the children home. The young folks will soon understand that three short whistles, repeated twice, means to come home quickly—they are wanted immediately. The sound is very penetrating and saves voice and strength.

Raise Colts.

It costs but little more to raise a colt than a steer, while the colt, if a good one, will sell for several times as much.

DO FLIES INJURE STOCK?

Experiments Which Seem to Prove That They Do Not Are Not Accepted as Final.

The results of a number of somewhat incomplete experiments carried out at the agricultural experiment stations seem to show that flies do not cause any great detriment to the health, happiness or profit of farm animals, and, indeed, one writer on the subject hints that flies may be a positive benefit, in that they remove exudates from the skin that may be considered a possible annoyance to the animal. All of which we prefer to take with a large grain of salt. We have all seen cattle get just as far away as possible from pestering flies. They enter water not merely to cool themselves, but to protect themselves against fly attacks. They stampede when certain flies buzz about them, and threaten to sting, suck or deposit their eggs. The cow does not stand quiet to be milked when flies are attacking her body. She is peaceful in comparison when milked in a screened and darkened stable.

When it comes to horses we are ready to state confidently that flies are certain torture during the hot months. Turn a horse out in the timber where flies abound and see if he does not lose flesh and injure his feet by constant pawing and stamping. Flies to our mind are a nuisance and a detriment to all animals. It is quite possible that milk flow and flesh or fat formation are not very seriously retarded or lessened by fly annoyance, but the animal tells us as plainly as a dumb beast can say that flies make life miserable in many instances. We know, too, that disease germs are spread by the attacks of flies. Anthrax in the form of malignant carbuncle is conveyed to man, and the same disease as well as some others is communicated in the same way, while the mosquito has been shown to carry the germs of yellow fever and malaria. Experiments to the contrary, says A. S. Alexander, in the Farmers' Review, we still believe that flies should be kept out of stables and from the backs of cattle, so far as possible. They congregate in millions about the barn yard, the manure pile and the feed and watering troughs. These attractions to flies should be as far as possible from the sheds supplied in the pastures. Shade trees at the distant fence or corner of the fields should be seen on every farm, and an attempt should be made to keep the manure hauled out and the conditions clean and sanitary in and about the stables. The use of fly repellers is to be advised. By their use cattle may be effectively protected against the attacks of the ox warble fly and sheep against the similar annoyance and actual torture of the gad fly. We have nothing to say against the value of experiments—they should be made more complete. Meanwhile the fly should be considered a pest and treated as such.

SHADE FOR STOCK.

Shed Which Can Be Made from Old Lumber and Which Will Protect Stock During Hot Days.

It is cruelty to animals to pasture livestock during hot weether where no shade or sheiter of any kind is provided. Hence, the wisdom of such a shed as shown in the accompanying cut, says Fred O. Sebler, in Farming. Any old lumber may be used for its construction, the most important part being to have good solid posts, on the top of which are spiked equally strong plates. Besides the protection from the scorching ray of the sun, such a sheiter affords great relief from flies, and from winds and storms. For the actual money invested, it is one of the cheapest and most practical structures that can be built on the farm.

A SHELTER FOR THE CATTLE.

THE FARM ANIMALS.

Balking is very often caused by abuse, overloading or tight harness.

You can get no more power from a horse than you give him in his food.

A sow to raise a strong litter must be in good flesh and well nurtured.

The principal advantage in cooking food for hogs is in making up a variety.

The man who will whip a frightened horse ought to have a dose of his own medicine.

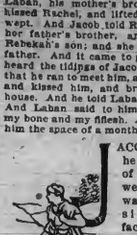
Keep the brood sow in an isolated place, away from noise and disturbance. If not overfat or feverish, she should then farrow without loss of the litter.

Some farmers object to working a mare in foal, but if they are not worked too much the mares and subsequent colts will do better than if the mares are left idle in the pasture.

The Rooster's Harem.

The number of females that can be mated with one male bird depends a great deal upon the male bird himself. If he is vigorous and strong and healthy he can safely be intrusted with a harem of a dozen females, or even 15; but if he is lacking in vigor, the number of females should be cut down proportionately. Better get one setting of strongly fertilized eggs than two settings of doubtful fertility.

Water allowed to remain in the soil freeze it cold.



JACOB AT HARAN

PART I.—The Wooing of Rachel.

OUR BIBLE STORY by the "Highway and Byway" Preacher (A Vision Between the Lines of God's Inspired Word.)

(Copyright, 1905, by J. M. Edson.)

Scripture Authority.—"And it came to pass, when Jacob saw Rachel, the daughter of Laban, his mother's brother, that Jacob went near and rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the flock of Laban, his mother's brother. And Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice, and wept. And Jacob told Rachel that he was her father's brother, and that he was Rebekah's son; and she ran and told her father. And it came to pass, when Laban heard the tidings of Jacob, his sister's son, that he ran to meet him, and embraced him, and kissed him, and brought him to his house. And he told Laban all these things. And Laban said to him, Surely thou art my bone and my flesh. And he abode with him the space of a month."—Gen. 29:10-14.

JACOB paused as he rested the jar of water on the well curbing and watched his cousin's animated face. During the three weeks he had been in his uncle's home he had discovered that there was a strong bond of sympathy between the beautiful girl he had first met at the well and himself. Usually reticent and reserved, he found himself talking with her with a freedom which he never thought possible with anyone. Day after day as the sun was setting and the flocks were gathering, he had gone to the well and drawn the water for Rachel's flocks, and as the sheep wandered slowly homeward they had had delightful talks together.

Rachel had confided her little secrets to him, and he in turn had told her of his home, of his father and mother, of his brother Esau and of the events leading up to his departure from home. Her ready sympathy and quick understanding encouraged and cheered him. The loneliness and homesickness which he had felt at first over separation from his home and his mother had yielded to the sweet influence of his fair cousin, and he found delight and comfort in her companionship.

That afternoon the other flocks had been watered first and had departed, leaving them alone. The sun had just dropped out of sight and was sending up its shaft of golden light, and at the point where it touched the fleecy bank of clouds floating in the heavens there came a rift like some great door rolling back to give entrance to the heavens beyond. Below little filmy snow white cloudlets floated about and here and there touched the glorious sunbeam and seemed to be mounting upward.

"See," Jacob had cried, eagerly, carried back in memory to that night at Bethel. "see the ladder and the angels." And then under the inspiration of the moment he had gone on and told Rachel the story of his vision, while she listened with breathless interest.

"Oh, I should like to have seen it," she exclaimed, clasping her hands in her lap, and gazing upward intently as though she half hoped and expected to see the real ladder reaching to Heaven, the opening portals and the ascending and descending angels. "And did you say that your God spoke to you?" Rachel continued, in awed voice, and lowering her eyes to Jacob's face she waited for him to reply.

"Yes."

"What did He say?" urged the girl, with intense interest.

"He told me He was the God of Abraham and of Isaac, and that He would bless me and keep me and return me to the land of my fathers and give it to me and to my seed."

Rachel sat silent, deep in thought, while Jacob finished watering the sheep, and then they started homeward.

"It is wonderful," she burst out at last, "and I believe He will do it, don't you?"

"Who? What?" asked Jacob, in confusion, for his mind was so filled with thoughts of the beautiful girl at his side that he had quite forgotten what he had last said.

"Why, what God promised you."

"Oh, yes, of course," he replied, smiling down at her appreciatively.

"Hi there, watch your sheep!"

Jacob and Rachel, startled by the sudden shout, looked up to see the latter's father pointing impatiently to the sheep which had scattered and were wandering farther and farther across the fields as they cropped here and there the succulent grasses.

"Humph," he ejaculated, "haven't eyes for much else but each other. What mother said was true, I guess. Needn't be afraid that Jacob will want to leave in a hurry. My, but he is a great fellow with the sheep and the cattle. Never would have pulled those lambs through if it hadn't been for his help. Seems to know just what they need. And the cattle are beginning to look better already under his care," and the crafty Laban smiled complacently to himself as he proceeded homeward.

"Well, mother," he exclaimed, as he removed his sandals and seated himself on the rug just outside the tent door where his wife was busy preparing the evening meal, "Jacob does seem mightily interested in Rachel. Think I will be able to drive a bargain with him to stay."

"Yes, it is all very well for Rachel, but what of Leah? Remember she is the elder daughter." And she stirred the pot vigorously by way of emphasis.

"Yes, I know, but we must keep Jacob somehow. The cattle are doing fine. I tell you he is a master hand at managing," and Laban looked at his wife a bit anxiously, for he feared her jealousy for Leah's rights might cause trouble. He coveted the services of Jacob, and was willing to sacrifice the custom of his people for the sake of making a bargain with him.

His wife made no response, and nothing more was said on the subject, but her mind was busy with a plan to help her daughter Leah.

The next day as Rachel was preparing to drive the flocks to the well, as usual, her mother said:

"Leah will water the sheep to-night, for I want you to help me with the work at home."

Rachel's face fell.

"But why can't I go with the sheep, mother?" she asked, petulantly. "Leah can help you better than I."

"Yes, but it is time you were learning to do more. Leah shall go."

And that settled it, and Rachel watched her sister depart with anxious heart. Would Jacob be there? Of course he would, for had he not so whispered to her as he had left in the morning to go with her father and brothers to the fields? She wondered whether he would miss her. Would he tell her sister all the interesting stories he had related to her? Would he be as gentle and kind to Leah as he had been to her?

That day, as on other days, Jacob hastened from the fields when the day's work was done and went towards the well.

"Surely the Lord is good to have brought me to this place," he exclaimed to himself as he stooped and picked some of the lilies growing in profusion all over the fields. "These will look beautiful in her dark hair," he thought.

He found the other shepherds gathered at the well, and they greeted him good-naturedly. They had become used to his visits hither, and had chafed him not a little on his devotion to his pretty cousin. To-night, noticing the flowers in his hand, they asked him if he had brought them to feed the lambs.

"Not enough for a taste," said one.

"No," responded another, "but he can give them all a smell around, and make them believe they are still roaming the fields." They all laughed at this sally, and Jacob, too happy to take offense at the crude joking, replied:

"These lilies bloomed for the fairest of maidens. And here she comes," he added as he lifted his eyes and saw Laban's sheep coming and a girlish figure in their midst.

He halloed to her and then started towards her, waving the blossoms above his head and shouting:

"See what I have gathered for thee."

Suddenly he stopped. That was not Rachel. It was Leah. Disappointment and anxiety seized him. He dropped the flowers in the grass, the flowers he had expected to see smile forth from Rachel's dark tresses, and then, eager to know why she had not come, he hastened to Leah's side and asked:

"Where is Rachel? Is she ill?"

Leah noted the disappointment in his face. It sent a pang to her heart, for since the coming of her cousin there had grown up in her heart a tender regard for him, and she had watched with jealous eye the intimacy which had sprung up between him and Rachel.

"Rachel is at home. She could not come."

"But why?" Jacob asked, shortly, searching the face of the woman before him.

"Mother would not let her," she responded, in a confused sort of way, and then added hastily: "But we are wasting time. The sheep must be watered."

As Leah moved towards the well whither the sheep had eagerly gone and where they were now bleating impatiently, Jacob was tempted to turn away and leave her to water the sheep alone, but getting the better of his ill-nature he followed and silently dipped the water from the well for her. And while she was busy giving to the thirsty animals, he watched her. He could not help making comparisons between her and her sister, the contrasts were so great. Her face was plain to almost homeliness, and her figure lacked the rounded grace which her more favored sister possessed, but as she raised her eyes and looked towards him he noticed how wonderfully deep and expressive they were. One looking into them became instantly conscious that behind them was a gentle, tender spirit.

The next day and the next he went to the well in hopes that at last Rachel would be there, but disappointment succeeded disappointment, and during those two days he only had fleeting glimpses of the girl. Not so much as a word or a smile. He wondered if she was avoiding him. His heart was troubled and he grew gloomy and homesick. The next day Laban was going with the boys to shear sheep down the valley by the riverside where the wool could be washed, and Jacob was going along. He felt he must see Rachel before going, and watching his opportunity he intercepted her as she was leaving her mother's tent, but the only reward of his vigilance was a smile and a nod from her, for just as he reached her side her mother called her and like a frightened bird she had flown back into the tent. The days dragged on. The sheep were sheared, and, though his spirits were low, Jacob had again proved his skill, and Laban was more than ever pleased with his sister's boy. On the third day they returned home, and as they came through the fields by a little wooded strip not far from the house, Jacob lingered behind, why he knew not save that his heart was heavy and sad. As he sat under one of the trees, wondering if he was going to see his beloved Rachel, he felt a gentle touch upon his arm and looking up found her bending over him.

"And you haven't been trying to avoid me," he asked for the fiftieth time as they walked slowly homeward. And for the fiftieth time Rachel responded: "Oh, Jacob, if you could only know how sad and lonesome I have been."

HOPED TO BE STIRRING.

Urin Was "Inclosed in the Room by Much Sickness," But Was Brave.

Admiral Urin is among the officers of the Japanese navy who began acquiring honors early in the fight with the Russians. A Detroit "boy," who has advanced rapidly in our own navy, relates the Free Press, writes this home:

"Urin received his nautical education at Annapolis. No one was ever a harder student or more conscientious in the performance of the manifold duties imposed upon a cadet.

"One day he was ill. The surgeon examined him and made a report that Urin was not in condition to perform his daily work. But the little fellow had a sense of obligation beyond this, and wrote thus to his favorite instructor:

"'You have seen that I do not to-day stand before you. I am inclosed in the room by much sickness. I do not feel like making the stir. To-morrow I hope greatly to find it easy to make the stir.'"

Lesson for Women.

Jersey Shore Pa., Aug. 28th (Special)—"Dodd's Kidney Pills have done worlds of good for me." That's what Mrs. C. B. Earnest of this place has to say of the Great American Kidney Remedy.

"I was laid up sick," Mrs. Earnest continues, "and had not been out of bed for five weeks. Then I began to use Dodd's Kidney Pills and now I am so I can work and go to town without suffering any. I would not be without Dodd's Kidney Pills. I have good reason to praise them everywhere."

Women who suffer should learn a lesson from this, and that lesson is "cure the kidneys with Dodd's Kidney Pills and your suffering will cease." Woman's health depends almost entirely on her kidneys. Dodd's Kidney Pills have never yet failed to make healthy kidneys.

BABY CAME NEAR DYING

From an Awful Skin Humor—Scratched Till Blood Ran—Wasted to a Skeleton—Speedily Cured by Cuticura.

"When three months old my boy broke out with an itching, watery rash all over his body, and he would scratch till the blood ran. We tried nearly everything, but he grew worse, wasting to a skeleton, and we feared he would die. He slept only when in our arms. The first application of Cuticura soothed him so that he slept in his cradle for the first time in many weeks. You don't know how glad I was. One set of the Cuticura Remedies made a complete and permanent cure. (Signed) Mrs. M. C. Maitland, Jasper, Ontario."

WORKING WOMEN

Their Hard Struggle Made Easier—Interesting Statements by a Young Lady in Boston and One in Nashville, Tenn.

All women work; some in their homes, some in church, and some in the whirl of society. And in stores, mills and shops tens of thousands are on the never-ceasing treadmill, earning their daily bread.

All are subject to the same physical laws; all suffer alike from the same physical disturbance, and the nature of their duties, in many cases, quickly drifts them into the horrors of all kinds of female complaints, ovarian troubles, ulceration, failing and displacements of the womb, leucorrhœa, or perhaps irregularity or suppression of "monthly periods," causing backache, nervousness, irritability and lassitude.

Women who stand on their feet all day are more susceptible to these troubles than others.

They especially require an invigorating, sustaining medicine which will strengthen the female organism and enable them to bear easily the fatigues of the day, to sleep well at night, and to rise refreshed and cheerful.

How distressing to see a woman struggling to earn a livelihood or perform her household duties when her back and head are aching, she is so tired she can hardly drag about or stand up, and every movement causes pain, the origin of which is due to some derangement of the female organism.

Miss F. Orser of 14 Warrenton Street, Boston, tells women how to avoid such suffering; she writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I suffered misery for several years with irregular menstruation. My back ached; I had bearing down pains, and frequent headaches; I could not sleep and could hardly drag around. I consulted two physicians without relief, and as a last resort, I tried Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and to my surprise, every ache and pain left me. I gained ten pounds and am in perfect health."

Miss Pearl Ackers of 327 North Summer Street, Nashville, Tenn., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I suffered with painful periods, severe backache, bearing-down pains, pains across the abdomen; was very nervous and irritable, and my trouble grew worse every month.

"My physician failed to help me and I decided to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I soon found it was doing me good. All my pains and aches disappeared, and I no longer fear my monthly periods."

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the unfailing cure for all these troubles. It strengthens the proper muscles, and displacement with all its horrors will no more crush you.

Backache, dizziness, fainting, bearing down pains, disordered stomach, moodiness, dislike of friends and society—all symptoms of the one cause—will be quickly dispelled, and it will make you strong and well.

You can tell the story of your sufferings to a woman, and receive helpful advice free of cost. Address Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass.

BOONE CO. RECORDER
Wednesday, - - Aug, 30, 1905.
W. L. RIDDELL. - - Publisher.

The envoys have agreed upon terms of peace for Russia and Japan.

That Louisville belle, who advertised three weeks ago that she had never been kissed, now has a husband to support.

Over in Indiana they use dynamite with which to blow negroes out of the State. Such proceedings in a southern State would be horrible.

The RECORDER will print another supply of stationery for its correspondents immediately after the fair, and requests those who need paper and envelopes to notify it that they may be supplied.

Carrollton's railroad is nearing completion, and the next thing the little city will get is a tobacco factory, which they claim is assured. Carrollton's capitalists have a way of going down into their pockets when they want a public improvement that is sure to win.

The tobacco raisers appear to be divided in opinion as to the best plan for bringing the combine to terms. While some are working hard to have the growers to perfect an organization there is a strong element that favors the production of not an acre of tobacco next year.

Johann Hoch, the Chicago wife murderer, who was to have been hanged last Friday was given another chance for his life by the issuing of a supersedeas by a Justice of the Illinois Supreme Court, which will have the effect of procuring a review of his case in that tribunal in October.

Col. George Washington, a leading attorney of the Campbell county bar, died at the home of a friend in Owen county, one day last week. He was visiting some of his Owen county friends when he was stricken with paralysis. He never regained consciousness. He was an able lawyer, and was the leading counsel in many noted law suits.

In some neighborhoods in this county the growers will have some trouble to find house room enough for their crops of tobacco. The old plan of hanging tobacco on a scaffold until partially cured in order to save house room, will have to be resorted to again. That requires an extra handling but with favorable weather it is fine for the tobacco.

The Rising Sun Local of last week closed the fourteenth year of the ownership by its editor, Murray Williams, and the anniversary of his purchase of the paper was commemorated by the donning of a new dress. Here is hoping that the Local and its editor may continue in prosperity and celebrate the same event annually for many years to come.

If the present attempt to organize the burley tobacco growers fails, then it will be many years before anything more can be done along that line. Growers will stay in after one or two failures, but a third will be the limit. Some of the promoters say that the farmers in many of the counties are coming forward with liberal subscriptions, and they are very much encouraged.

A Kansas farmer went to the pastor of his church and asked that his name be stricken from the church list. "What is the trouble, Brother Jones ?" asked the surprised minister. "I supposed you was a faithful follower of the lamb." "Well, I sorter thought that myself, but there's just no use a talkin', a man can't serve the Lord where he has to milk five cows in fly time. After the first heavy frost I'll try this church business again, but now I'll either have to sell my cows or give up church work, or be a durned hypocrite."

Collector Sam J. Roberts, of Lexington, has read the riot act to the colored members of his party. In an editorial in his paper, the Leader, he says: "No matter from what source the demand of the negroes comes and whatever may be the motive that prompts it there is only one conclusion to be reached, and that is that a division of the Republican ticket between the whites and blacks would be political suicide for the party and disaster to the negro race, and he serves notice on the negro that no member of the race will be placed on the ticket in his city and county this fall or in the future.

In the Owensboro Messenger of the 25th inst., Uri Woodson fires a broadside of wind at Judge Lassing, his effort being inspired by an article from Ludlow, which appeared in the RECORDER of the 9th inst. Uri, has, for a long time, been particularly noted for his frequent and reckless predictions during the progress of a campaign, and especially so ever since he went about the country last fall giving out interviews telling how Parker and Davis were going to sweep States that voted almost unanimously against them. Mr. Woodson is like a great many others in Kentucky in regard to the machine--when the machine is pushing him and his friends to the front its acts are not to be questioned, but so soon as another and his friends are in control he raises a holy howl, and charges that the party is being sent to the demnition bow-wows. The most remarkable part of Mr. Woodson's article is discovered by reading between the lines. It is then that it is revealed how delighted Mr. Woodson is with the threats in that article to bolt the nominees of the recent Kenton county primary election. The tone of that article is so in accord with Mr. Woodson's rebellious feelings that he at once concludes that it reflects the sentiments of most of the Kenton county Democrats, in which he is wrong again as usual in his political conclusions. It is apparent that Mr. Woodson has forgotten that the only time this State ever went Republican was while he was cutting a very wide swath as one of the principal wheels in the party machinery in Kentucky. But since Mr. Lassing has been one of the party's leaders the party has not suffered a like disaster in Kentucky, but if Uri's prayers are answered the party in Kentucky will get a terrible ripping up the back at the polls next November.

The Boone County Pomona Grange has decided to see what it can do towards putting a stop to the wreckless driving of automobiles on the public highways in this county, and have notices of warning printed, which will be scattered over the county. The people through the county are afraid to go upon the public roads with their horses and buggies since automobiles have made their appearance, and it is especially dangerous for women and children to go alone in buggies. Occasionally an automobile is met the driver of which has some regard for the rights and safety of others, but they are exceptions, and it is not against them that the Pomona Grange is directing its efforts.

This talk about Kentucky's beautiful women, their accomplishments, etc., is very nice, but the talkers have about talked themselves out of a job. Everything said about them now in that mood is ancient history. Let us hear something about the Kentucky girl who can draw the plans and specifications and build a four-story cake fit for a king; who can hand over a pie that would make the inventor of pies ask foolish questions about it; who can prepare a dinner that would make your eyes stick out like loose ulster buttons; who has all the personal charms God intended women to have and who knows how to darn socks and sew up rents. That's the girl we want to hear something about.

Pennsylvania courts have decided that intoxicating liquor is not food and, therefore, may be adulterated in that State with impunity, says the Memphis Commercial-Appeal. Dr. Warren, Chief of the Dairy and Food Department, attempted to regulate this matter. He discovered through his agents that 95 per cent of the liquors sold in Pennsylvania were grossly adulterated and that, too, with drugs deleterious in the extreme to health. But when he attempted prosecution he was met with the judgment of the court that declared his proceedings unconstitutional.

At this time for several years the fields and pastures have been dry and dusty, and the farmers were much discouraged by the gloomy outlook for the approaching winter. How different now. There were never finer prospects for fall pastures, while provender of every kind is abundant, and instead of that woe-begon look to which the farmers had become accustomed at this particular season of the year, they are now the pictures of contentment and happiness—everything is going their way in this good year of the Lord 1905.

BASE BALL.

Boones vs. Ft. Thomas,
AT BURLINGTON PARK,
MONDAY, SEPT. 4th, 1905.
Two Games—First game at 10:30 a m., second game at 2:30 p. m

WALTON vs BOONES
at Burlington Park,
SATURDAY, SEPT. 9th, '05.
Game called at 2:30 o'clock p. m.

The Boones and Hebron ball teams played on the grounds of the latter last Saturday afternoon. Up to the last half of the seventh inning the score was 4 to 0 in favor of the Boones, when the Hebron boys made 5 runs, two of which were the result of a misconstruction of the ground rules, by which side the writer does not know. Nothing more was done until the ninth inning when, the Boones tied the score, and in the tenth inning made six runs after two men had been retired. The features of the game were Bullock's sensational work in left field and at the bat and Ira Walton's professional work at third. As usual, Luck started the trouble in the ninth by batting in the tie run. Dock Houston and Mike Clore played fast ball for Hebron. Following is the score by innings:

Struck out—by Conner, 12; Walton, 6. Two base hits—Conner, Clutterbuck, Luck, Houston, Gordon, 2.

The 54th annual of this popular old fair will be held on the beautiful and spacious grounds at East Enterprise, Indiana, September 5th 6th, 7th and 8th, 1905 and a big lot of money is being spent on it to make the fair one of the best. The special poultry show under the auspices of the poultry clubs of Vevay and Warsaw, Ky., will be held Thursday, Sept. 7th, and it will be worth seeing. $740.00 will be expended in the horse races; $175.00 pacing race, $175.00 trotting race $100 00 running race. Among the special features will be "Fun at the Mill." An old fashioned Dutch grist mill is erected on the ground, and two acrobats who are also funny actors make a lot of fun by ludicrous positions jumping out the windows, etc. "From Horn to Horn" is a mid air flight by the wonderful Melville, who was the drawing card at Barnum & Bailey's great circus. This act alone is worth the 25 cents price of admission to the fair, which is the only charge made. Come Thursday. Send for premium list to Scott Thompson, Secretary, Rising Sun, Indiana, or D. B. Wallace, Warsaw, Ky.

Almost Another Killing.

Last Tuesday evening Louie Writman shot and severely wounded his brother Jacob Writman and his wife. Louie Writman is a bachelor and resided on his little farm in the North Bend neighborhood. Several years ago he was adjudged of unsound mind and sent to an asylum for the insane, where he remained for several months. Upon his release from that institution he returned to this county, and such of his property as circumstances had not made it necessary to sell was restored to him, but since that time he has manifested a dislike for his brother Jacob and all others who took any part in the proceeding that resulted in his being sent to Lakeland, as well as to those in whose charge his property was put to be preserved in his absence. His dislike for his brother became intense, he claiming that the lunacy proceedings were instituted so Jacob could get his property. He had ordered Jacob to keep off of his land. There is a neighborhood passway over the lands of Louie Writman and others along the river in North Bend neighborhood, and Jacob Writman and wife were passing over Louie's land traversed by the private passway, when Louie fired upon them with his shot gun loaded with rabbit shot. Immediately after the shooting Louie Writman crossed the river to Coal City, where he was arrested and lodged in jail to await the action of the Kentucky authorities. Sheriff Allphin went over after Writman, but he refused to return to Kentucky, and the officers promised to hold him until requisition papers could be secured, when he will be brought back to this county.

Dr. H. H. Hays, of Bullittsville, was called to attend Jacob Writman and wife, who, at first appeared to be dangerously hurt. All kinds of reports as to the condition of the wounded people were flying through the neighborhood, and when the doctor announced that the wounds were not as severe as reported, the people of the surrounding country were very much relieved, as they feared the worst results from the shooting. Dr. Hays has watched his patients very closely since they were wounded and has pronounced them out of danger, but is of the opinion that each will have to have one eye-ball removed.

The necessary papers from Governor Beckham arrived in last Sunday's mail, and Sheriff Allphin left immediately for Columbus, Ohio, to submit them to Gov. Herrick, who honored them, and yesterday Writman was brought to Burlington and lodged in jail.

The "Home of the Hot Devils" is an island of fire situated in the center of a huge lake of boiling mud and slime in Java. Gases arise from the lower depths and form enormous bubbles in the sticky mud, which grow and increase until they attain a diameter of five or six feet. These bubbles are often carried skyward by the wind, where they finally burst with a loud explosion.

The moon being much the nearest to us of all the heavenly bodies we can pronounce more definitely in its case than in any other. We know that neither air nor water exists on the moon in quantities sufficient to be perceived by the most delicate tests at our command. It is certain that the moon's atmosphere, if any exists, is less than the thousandth part of the density of that around us.

The sultan of Turkey's dinner costs him $5,000 a day. The table is of silver, and it is said to be the most exquisite specimen of the silversmith's art that the world contains. The dishes are brought in upon the heads of jubiaklars, or cooks' assistants, and each dish is covered and sealed with the royal seal. There are always 50 or more dishes, and all are set before the sultan at one same time. He eats, usually, from about six.

Sermons in stones have become common enough since geologists learned to interpret the secrets of fossils. To awaken melodies and harmonies in pebbles and rocks would seem a much more difficult, if not impossible, achievement. It has been accomplished, however, for there is in existence a wonderful piano, the notes of which are given forth by flints arranged in a regular scale. The tones of this geological piano are of remarkable quality.

While another famine is threatening India, owing to the scant rain brought by the southwest monsoon, and while the crops of Russia are falling short of previous years, it is cheering to observe the period of peace and plenty that this year means to the United States. The August report tells a story of vast stores of golden grain for the consumer and wealth for the farmer. The winter wheat crop is estimated at 424,500,000 bushels. The spring wheat production is placed at 285,231,000.

Hinter mountain, in the Ft. Davis region of Western Texas, appears to be a most peculiar structure. This gigantic mass emits vapors that intoxicate the adventurers who climb to its summit. When half way up the mountain the climber becomes conscious of a perfume like strong ozone, and this perfume is no less deadly in its effect than the intoxicating constituents of alcoholic drinks. No sooner has the climber reached the top than he staggers, and finally falls in a stupor on the rocks.

WORDS AND MONEY.

That is the Question That Separates the Peace Envoys.

Deadlock on the Verge of Final Rupture—No New Instructions Were Received by M. Witte Regarding Compromise Proposition.

Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 24.—The Japanese plenipotentiaries at the conclusion of the afternoon session Wednesday of the peace conference threw the cards upon the table. It was the dramatic moment—the moment to which all the previous proceedings of the conference had led.

Mr. Witte sat silent and the move in the great diplomatic game passed to Japan. Baron Komura, in a few words, explained that Japan, in her great desire for peace, was ready to make certain "modifications" of the original articles in the hope that Russia would find it possible to accept them. He then presented in writing to Mr. Witte the compromise proposition which President Roosevelt had suggested.

It offered to withdraw article 9, providing for the payment by Russia of Japan's bill for the cost of the war, on condition that Russia would accept article 5, which provides for the cession of the Island of Sakhalin, so modified as to include an arrangement for the re-purchase by Russia of the northern half of the island for 1,200,000,000 yen. In addition it offered to withdraw entirely articles 11 and 12 (surrender of the interned warships and limitation upon Russia's sea power in the far east).

Without a moment's hesitation Mr. Witte said he could not accept it.

Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 25.—At 11 o'clock Thursday night six cablegrams had been received by Mr. Witte from St. Petersburg. All came from Count Lamsdorff and all were opposed to the Japanese compromise proposition as presented at Wednesday's meeting. However, it is stated that the cablegrams announce that the direct pour parlers are now in progress between Emperor Nicholas and the president.

Oyster Bay, N. Y., Aug. 25.—A crisis in the peace negotiations is approaching rapidly. Whether there is to be peace between Russia and Japan, or a continuance of the war will be determined very likely within a few days. Since he made his direct appeal to Emperor Nicholas, President Roosevelt has been awaiting developments, hopeful that such efforts as he has felt proper to make to avert a failure of the Washington conference might not be futile.

It is quite certain now that, in addition to making a direct appeal to the Russian emperor to take such measures as may bring the pending negotiations to a successful issue, President Roosevelt has communicated with the Japanese government along similar lines. Whether that appeal was made directly to the emperor of Japan, as in the case of Emperor Nicholas, can not be ascertained.

Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 26.—A press representative is permitted to announce that Emperor Nicholas' answer to President Roosevelt's latest appeal was partially responsive.

The peace conference seems headed straight for the rocks, despite the fact that every question of principle involved in the quarrel between the two countries has been settled in favor of the victor and that in reality only "words and money" still separate them, the negotiations seem on the verge of a final rupture. The air was filled Friday night with gloomy forebodings, as superficially everything indicated that Saturday's session of the conference will prove the "seance d'adieu."

In the most positive fashion it is declared that no new instructions had reached Mr. Witte up to Friday evening which would permit him to entertain the consideration of the compromise proposition submitted by Baron Komura.

Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 28.—The life of the peace conference Sunday seemed to hang by a thread, but the thread will not be broken Monday. At 10 o'clock Sunday night, after a two hour's conference between Mr. Takahira and Mr. Witte, in the latter's room in the hotel annex, the announcement of a postponement was made. Mr. Witte explained that Mr. Takahira had told him that no new instructions had reached him from Tokio, and fearing none might be received before the meeting scheduled for Monday afternoon he had suggested the propriety of postponing the meeting until Tuesday. To this Mr. Witte said he readily assented. Mr. Takahira made the following statement:

"Inasmuch as this conference was initiated by the friendly offices of the president, after consultation we felt that we should be cautious about terminating its labors."

Pressed as to whether he regarded the situation as hopeless, Mr. Takahira said:

"No; not hopeless, but almost hopeless."

OUST THE DEMON.

A Tussle with Coffee.

There is sometbing fairly demoniacal in the way coffee sometimes wreaks its fiendish malice on those who use it.

A lady writing from Calif. says:—

"My husband and I, both lovers of coffee, suffered for some time from a very annoying form of nervousness, accompanied by most frightful headaches. In my own case there was eventually developed some sort of affection of the nerves leading from the spine to the head.

"I was unable to hold my head up straight, the tension of the nerves drew it to one side, causing me the most intense pain. We got no relief from medicine, and were puzzled as to what caused the trouble, till a friend suggested that possibly the coffee we drank had something to do with it, and advised that we quit it and try Postum Coffee.

"We followed his advice, and from the day that we began to use Postum we both began to improve, and in a very short time both of us were entirely relieved. The nerves became steady once more, the headache ceased, the muscles in the back of my neck relaxed, my head straightened up, and the dreadful pain that had so punished me while I used the old kind of coffee vanished.

"We have never resumed the use of the old coffee, but relish our Postum every day as well as we did the former beverage. And we are delighted to find that we can give it freely to our children, also, something we never dared to do with the old kind of coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum Coffee contains absolutely no drugs of any kind, but relieves the coffee drinker from the old drug poison.

SHAFT TO PATRIOTS

SPLENDID MEMORIAL TO MARTYRS OF PRISON SHIP.

Awful Treatment of Captured Yankees Recalled by the Project for Monument in Brooklyn Park—Horror Beyond Description.

Two hundred thousand dollars have just been raised among the citizens of the United States for the erection of a colossal shaft to the memory of the martyrs of British prison ships in general and famous "Old Jersey" in particular during the revolutionary war. The monument is to be erected in Fort Greene park, Brooklyn, and is to be placed over the bones of war heroes who have perished under the awful treatment afforded by the English government for their American prisoners.

Every prison ship in the British service treated its captives in an outrageous manner but "Old Jersey," known to sailors as "The Hell Afloat," was king of them all in the terrible treatment of American prisoners. The

THE PROPOSED MONUMENT.

Jersey was originally a 74 gun ship, and at the commencement of the American revolution, being found in a state of decay and unfit for service at sea, she was dismantled, moored in the East river, New York, and used as a store ship. In the year 1780 she was converted into a prison ship and continued to be used for that purpose during the remainder of the war on the Long Island shore.

Horror, beyond description, reigned supreme in this improvised prison. Upon approaching the ship one's fears were at once aroused because of the gloomy appearance of the vessel; but once within its confines and fears turned to terrible dread. Lack of food, contact with vermin and wicked treatment by the British officers made life unbearable and death extremely welcome to the captured Yankees. To the visitor a motley crew, with clothes clinging to their bodies, vermin simply seething in their apparel, and emaciated from hunger, filth and disease, presented itself. The menu, if one dare call it that name, is vouched for as follows in an authentic revolutionary tale: On Sunday, one pound of biscuit, one pound of pork and half a pint of peas. Monday, one pound of biscuit, one pint of oatmeal and two ounces of butter. Tuesday, one pound of biscuit and two pounds of salt beef. Wednesday, one and a half pounds of flour and two ounces of suet. Thursday was a repetition of Sunday's fare, Friday of Monday's, and Saturday of Tuesday's.

With this food of good quality and properly cooked there could be no possible complaint but the bread was, as a rule, filled with worms and the pork was literally rotten. Oftentimes the starving prisoners were cheated out of their portion and upon other occasions when the officers saw need for punishment, their rations were cut in two.

At stated periods work gangs were selected from the prisoners and these men were obliged to do all the menial labor about the vessel. The skins of the prisoners, washed with salt water, soon after their advent upon the prison ship, became like parchment and from the treatment received, it is but little wonder that 11,000 Americans perished from starvation and poisoning during the time which the ship was the home of the "rebel" captives. The reader may wonder why concentrated efforts to escape could not secure freedom.

The one successful run for liberty is somewhat comical. A party of New York gentlemen who were wont to visit the ship, and witness the misery there drew up alongside one morning in a yawl. Scarcely had the men reached the main deck when a "mess" of prisoners stealthily descended into the yawl and were not discovered until very near the opposite shore. While shots of the soldiers fell all around them, the leader who was at the helm, stood erect in the yawl, and, to show his contempt for the British, tantalizingly put his thumb to his nose and wagged his fingers. British feelings were further ruffled when the prisoners on board gave three hearty cheers. They were forced below at the point of the bayonet and put on short rations for punishment.

Washington at one time complained threatening to be revenged upon captive English, if conditions were not improved and the situation changed a trifle for the better. Bones of a number of the victims were found some years ago on Long Island beach and it is over their remains, that the citizens of the country have made it possible to erect a fitting memorial.

W. W. GARRISON.

POLICIES OF REPUBLICANS.

Great Difference of Opinion on Vital Issues—The Trusts or the People?

Our republican friends appear to be much troubled with what the next congress will do. All kinds of advice and prognostications are being promulgated by the leaders and organs of the different factions. The republican party is confronted with a serious difference of opinion on most important matters, but the chief thing that bothers the republican leaders in congress is how to serve two masters without giving serious offense to either.

The Biblical injunction that "ye cannot serve God and mammon" appears to be lost on these aspiring politicians, for though, of course, very anxious to serve the dear people, their underground connection with the mammon of unrighteousness—the corporations and their predaceous proprietors—is forever pulling them in the wrong direction. The people are demanding railroad rate legislation; the railroads are determined against any such interference with their vested rights. The people also want tariff reform, at least enough of it to prevent the trusts selling cheaper abroad than here, but it is dollars to doughnuts the trusts will hold the whip hand. There is a deficiency of millions in the national treasury, which must be provided for by new taxation or extensive economy. The question of digging the Panama canal to sea level must be decided. Here, again, the transcontinental railroads are interested. Reciprocity with Canada; free trade with the Philippines; Chinese exclusion and a multitude of minor questions are pressing for settlement, and in nearly every case there is some large interest that is pulling one way while the people are to be best served in the other direction.

Speaker Cannon is said to be in great tribulation over the selection of a floor leader for the house of representatives who will help him to carry his "stand pat" ideas on tariff and railroads. He is known to be opposed to the Roosevelt policies, and will appoint his committee accordingly; so that it will be impossible to get a unanimous report on any reform legislation, or perhaps any report at all on the bills the administration favors.

It will be doloroso days for the small fry—the great majority of the republican members of congress—they will be between two fires. They must be friendly with the speaker, or their local legislation will be jeopardized. They must be welcome at the white house, or their hopes of patronage will go glimmering, and even candidates for fourth-class postmasters will laugh them to scorn. It is possible, of course, that the president and the speaker may agree to compromise—that is for congress to do nothing of great consequence, except, of course, to make speeches teeming with love for the dear people, pass the appropriation bills, with a great claim for economy, and go home trusting to the trusts and corporations for enough cash to overcome the disgust of their constituents.

The democratic members, being in the minority, can do nothing. The drastic rules of the republican majority will effectually prevent most of them from even having a chance to express an opinion. But the democrats will, by keeping a bold front and acting together on all questions on the side of the people, so impress public opinion that the voters will intrust them with power at the election of 1906.

FROM THE POLITICAL PRESS.

——When will these exposures of republican rottenness end? Five moro republican officials of Philadelphia have been indicted for ballot box stuffing and conspiracy.

——The treasury deficit for July is $13,855,663 and the public debt has increased $12,182,229 during the same period. The tariff, extravagance and stand-pat-ism are the causes and the party in power is responsible.

——That "open door" to China seems to be closing rapidly against us after all our years of diplomacy to keep it open. What value are the Philippines—the key to the orient—to us, if they will not unlock the door that our goods may enter?

——It has not yet been reported that Elihu Root, secretary of state, has given up his position as attorney for the tobacco trust. Perhaps he agrees with Secretary Taft that federal salaries are much too low and needs the trust money to make both ends meet.

——Senator Cullom, of Illinois, is urging his party associates to economize, yet he has been voting for all the extravagant expenditures that the republican party has been guilty of. Perhaps Senator Cullom's spasm of virtue may be induced because he is a candidate for reelection next year. There are a dozen or more republican senators in the same boat, who are helping to train the sails to catch a favoring breeze of popular approval.

——Is not the democratic position that, the tariff must be revised to protect the American people from trust rapacity, a reasonable and just solution of one phase of the trust problem?

——If anyone thinks that high railroad rates do not affect him, he may change his mind when he knows that in 1903 the average freight paid by each person in the United States amounted to $16.72. So the average family of five pay $83.60 as their share of the transportation charges and yet the republican leaders don't want to regulate railroad rates.

ENCOURAGES DEMOCRATS.

Their Policies Brought to the Front and Republican Corruption Exposed.

Everything tends to encourage democrats that the time is ripe for the reforms they stand for. The corruption and graft in all departments of the government demand a change of administration, for experience proves that no party has been able to cleanse its own skirts. President Roosevelt may do all he can, but corruption is too deep rooted in his party for him to be able to accomplish such a task. Here and there he may succeed in stopping corruption in places where it has been forced into the light, only to find that still other exposures show the canker still exists. Every case of corruption exposed has been through a disagreement amongst the thieves and not through official investigation. On all sides he is surrounded by republican leaders who are interested in monopoly. The tariff barons and the railroad magnates have their spokesmen in both houses of congress and even the president's cabinet is not clear of them. The minor officials and clerks of the government see graft in high places and very naturally some of them have come to believe that as opportunity offers they should make the most of it.

This graft era can only be overcome by the people changing the party in control from time to time, for long lease of power has ever bred extravagance, corruption and looting of the treasury by favored interests. How powerless even the president is to overcome this corrupt disposition of his party is shown by his surrendering to the demands of the leaders on his expressed determination of calling congress together at an early date, which he has now been obliged to postpone until within three weeks of the regular time of meeting. He may recommend to congress that it reform the tariff; that it give power to the interstate commerce commission to regulate unreasonable railroad rates; that it ratify reciprocity treaties with foreign countries; that it reduce the Philippine tariff; that it pass the necessary legislation to curb the trusts; but his words will be as the idle winds to the corporation controlled congress he has to deal with. Similar recommendations by the president to the two last congresses were unheeded by the republican leaders.

It is encouraging to democrats that all these reforms mentioned are the policies that have been endorsed by the democracy in their platforms, or have been the expressed policy of the democratic members of congress. The republican leaders point to this, secretly at least, as sufficient reason why they should not adopt such policies, and the tariff beneficiaries, the trusts and the railroad corporations are busy in backing up the position of the republican leaders. They talk of the president as a "trouble breeder" and are prepared to spend millions to defeat the legislation mentioned.

Will President Roosevelt stick to his determination to stand by the people or will his strenuousness vanish before the avowed purpose of many of the republican leaders to "stand pat"—that is, do nothing of consequence to hurt their friends, the corporations?

If President Roosevelt is determined to force his policy upon his party he will have a large following, but such a course might split the republican party and lead to the election of a democratic house of representatives next year and a democratic president in 1908.

One of two things must happen, either the republican party must be cleansed of grafters and give the people the reforms they desire, or the voters will turn the rascals out.

Monopolists Protected.

Indirect taxation picks the pockets of every person, not even sparing women or children, blind, halt, maimed, imbeciles or lunatics. Not only must the indirect tariff tax be paid by all who buy, but the tariff-fostered trusts collect a similar tax in the same indirect method as the government collects it. The only difference being that while the custom house officer is collecting for the government, which the merchant who sells the goods has to add to the price, the trust who produces the same class of goods not only charges a good round profit, but adds the amount that the tariff tax would be into the bargain. This republican system of fostering monopolies they call protecting American industry, but it is not difficult to see that it is the monopolists that are protected and the people taxed under such a system.

——Secretary Shaw of his secretary announces that floods of invitations are being received by him to address public meetings in all parts of the country. As a spellbinder Secretary Shaw is evidently a greater success than as secretary of the treasury, as far as the people who pay the taxes are concerned. An investigation of the treasury would show that the secretary might be more useful if he would attend more strictly to the business he is paid for doing.

THIRTEEN DEATHS.

Largest Number on Any Day Since the Yellow Fever Began.

New Orleans, Aug. 28.—Report to 6 p. m. Sunday: New cases, 21; total to date, 1,743; deaths, 13; total, 255; [illegible]2; total, 402; remaining under treatment, 119.

New Orleans, Aug. 28.—The record shows the smallest number of new cases since August 6, and the largest number of deaths on any day since the fever made its appearance. The unusual number of deaths is attributed in a measure to the change in the weather, Saturday night being cool and pleasant, in great contrast to the weather of the preceding week. Three well-known merchants are among the new cases. Only two names that can be traced to Italian origin are among the 31.

Other reports from the country are as follows: Patterson, no new cases and no deaths; Amelia, two new cases; Bayou Boeuf, one case; Pecan Grove, three cases and one death; Elizabeth plantation, one death; Hanson City, four new cases and one death; St. Pose, two cases; Port Barrow, two cases; Ninth Ward of Jefferson parish, one case; Lake Providence, three cases; Gulfport, three cases; Mississippi City, no new cases.

UNION PRINTERS.

Thirty-Seven Shops Controlled By Chicago Typothetate Will Go on Strike.

Chicago, Aug. 28.—Before the middle of this week every union printer in the 37 shops controlled by the Chicago Typothetae will be on strike, and before another week the fight may be extended to 12 of the principal cities of the middle west, the employers of which are organized, with the Chicago Typothetae, into a middle west association. This forms a part of the national body of master printers.

That the printers will put up a long and bitter fight against the Typothetae was foreshadowed Sunday when Typographical Union, Local No. 16, met at Brand's hall and raised the strike assessment from two to ten per cent. The union also decided to force the fighting by presenting at once the demands for an eight-hour agreement and an agreement for closed shops.

The raising of the strike assessment means an addition of $8,000 weekly to the defense fund, and the printers say they can keep 900 men on the street without touching the $1,000,000 fund which the union says it is ready to spend if necessary.

NEGRO LYNCHED.

He Was Charged With Attempted Robbery and Assault.

Newburn, N. C., Aug. 28.—John Moore, a negro, 20 years old, was taken from Craven county jail in this city and lynched by a mob of 100 masked men armed with rifles and revolvers.

With his hands tied behind him, the negro was led out about a third of a mile from the jail to the draw of Neuse river bridge, banged to one of its braces and his body riddled with bullets.

Moore entered the country store of George Eubanks at Clarks, seven miles from Newbern last Friday when the proprietor's wife was the only one in. The negro attempted robbery and struck Mrs. Eubanks on the head with an axe, fracturing bones and inflicting injuries which if they do not prove fatal will at least cause not only disfigurement but life-long suffering.

UNITED MINE WORKERS.

They Will Demand Recognition of the Union and An Eight-Hour Day.

Tamagua, Pa., Aug. 28.—John Mitchell, president of the United Mine Workers of America, in a speech at Manila park, made an unequivocal declaration that his organization will at the expiration of the present wage agreement in April, next, demand recognition of the union and an eight-hour day. President Mitchell said that he hoped by that time he would be able to go before George F. You can take it or leave it."

It Will Not End Until the Exclusion Act Ends.

Portland, Ore., Aug. 28.—"The boycott upon American goods in China will never end until the Chinese people are admitted free into the United States, or until the same discriminations are made against the inferior classes of other nations as those which we make against the coolies of China."

STATE ITEMS OF INTEREST

THE SMITH MURDER.

William Newton, Relative of Cal Newton, Under Arrest.

Frankfort, Ky., Aug. 26.—William aged 23 years, relative of Cal Newton, who is charged with the murder of the Smiths, father and son, at Elmville, was arrested near that place Friday afternoon. He was not brought to jail here, but kept under guard over night at the home of Sheriff Jeffers. There he was "sweated" by Commonwealth's Attorney Franklin, the sheriff and Detectives Robert Stubbs and Fred Kenner, of the city department of New Orleans, La., who are in Kentucky on business and happened to be guests at the sheriff's home. The conference lasted until midnight, and the length of it and the fact that Newton was not brought on to jail here, are taken as evidence that he has broken down and told a story to the officers. The new suspect, according to Cal Newton's own statement, was with him all of the morning of the day of the shooting, and at the time it took place.

RESULT OF A FEUD.

Louis Reitman Shoots His Brother and His Sister-in-Law.

Covington, Ky., Aug. 24.—Louis Reitman was arrested at noon by Marshal Bockert while he was crossing the river to the Ohio side. The marshal followed him up in a skiff. He was locked up in the Delhi jail. The dying embers of an ancient feud, long forgotten, were fanned into flame at Taylorsport, Boone county, Ky., and Louis Reitman, farmer, was arrested, while side by side in their little cottage on Stringtown pike lie Jacob, his brother, and his wife, Sarah, their heads torn by charges of shot fired by Reitman. Long ago the feud of the Reitman's became a memory in Taylorsport. Everybody had forgotten it except Louis. He had a grievance, or believed he had, and it haunted his mind until it became his dream by night and the inspirer to vengeance by day.

COAL LANDS SOLD.

An Eastern Syndicate Buys 25,000 Acres In Eastern Kentucky.

Mt. Sterling, Ky., Aug. 26.—The North American Coal Co., headed by J. Pierpont Morgan, of New York, has just completed a purchase of 25,000 acres of coal lands in Pike, Johnson and Floyd counties in the Big Sandy valley. The lands cost about $300,000 and developments will be begun at once. The coal company has an option on 10,000 acres additional. A representative of the company says several mines will be opened and railroads built to connect with the C. & O. The entrance of Morgan's company into Eastern Kentucky means much to its vast undeveloped resources.

JUMPED FROM A ROOF.

But the Fugitive Was Caught By Officers As He Landed.

Lexington, Ky., Aug. 25.—After eluding the police for three months Ollie Bush, son of a prominent Henry county farmer, was brought here from his father's home and arraigned before County Judge Bullock on a charge made by Miss Rosa McKenna, aged 18. In default of $1,000 bail he was remanded to jail to await trial. The charge against Bush was made three months ago, and the young lady in question is now confined in a hospital in Louisville, Ky. The young people were both employed at the Eastern Kentucky lunatic asylum, in this city. The complainant is the daughter of Mrs. John Vaughn, of Fifth and Chestnut streets, and is one of the most beautiful young girls in the city. When the officers from this city attempted to arrest Bush he made an unsuccessful effort to escape by way of the roof of his father's house. He was caught as he jumped to the ground.

The companies are from Bowling Green, Central City, Henderson, Hopkinsville, Mayfield, Owensboro, Madisonville and Earlington. Another storm hit the camp at 1 o'clock. There was a small panic among the general officers, Gov. Beckham and his staff. For an hour the lightning was one continuous flash. The governor worked heroically with Gen. Haley to keep [illegible] from going down. Both were [illegible] with rain. This was the second storm the governor experienced in camp in 24 hours. Friday night Gov. Beckham and staff gave the society people of Paducah a german at the Park pavilion.

But Few are Left.

I have just learned through N. [illegible]dell, his nephew, that Joseph Riddell is dead. He was a brother to the late Fountain Riddell, the lawyer, W. L. Riddell of the Recorder, the widow of the late Morgan Rice and the mother of Mrs. Nettie Hughes (nee Gardner), and a cousin of the late Judge Cyrus Riddell. I have known Joseph Riddell since his early boyhood. We attended the same school at Willoughby Methodist church near Belleview, about the year 1843, taught by one Myron H. Lee, of the State of New York, a fine teacher and the finest scribe I ever knew. Of the pupils that attended that school, so far as I know, only the following persons are still living: A. B. W. Allen, now visiting in Louisville, Kentucky; James T. Grant, who resides at Bullittsville; Mrs. L. Graves Gaines, my brother and myself. The late R. C. Green, Josiah H. Walton and his brother George W. Walton, were also pupils in the same school. Robert Rice, a younger brother to Morgan Rice and Scott Rice, and who married Bettie Grant, who survives, also attended that school. He died in early life.

Joseph Riddell and Josiah H. Walton in boyhood were very much alike in disposition and temperament. They were both light-hearted, kind, gentle and amiable. They both possessed warm and generous natures. They were universally popular, and beloved by fellow students and teacher. They were both good students, bright and always faithful in the discharge of their duty. The latter was never very robust and died some years ago, respected and beloved by all who knew him, an honest man and always a gentleman. The former was more vigorous and robust and reached the age of about 77 years.

A short while ago, I am informed Joseph Riddell retired from his farm and removed to Bellevue, where he hoped to live a more restful life, and where he died, when that quiet, restful period had barely begun.

Boone county never had any better citizens than Joseph Riddell and Josiah H. Walton. I name them both in this connection, because they were from the same school, were about the same age, and were so much alike in their general make-up. They were good citizens, honest, upright and true in all the relations of life. They were of pure morals, steady habits and of sterling integrity. I dare say they both died without an enemy and respected and beloved by all who knew them. I realize that my early associates are rapidly passing away—but few are left.

To My Boone County Friends.

Feeling very grateful to my friends of Boone [illegible] for their patronage during the past lamb season, I am proud to say to them that I have handled over 100,000 lambs in the past three months at a profit I never experienced in the history of the trade, the lowest [illegible] being 7c up to 8 65. BATTLE AT CYNTHIANA.

To the Editor of the Recorder:

What our Savior said of the poor he might have said of the fanatic and the crank. They too are "always with us." Barring all such, the war is over; its results have long since been accepted; all reasonable and rationable minds are reconciled to the conditions produced by the war that only lingers in the shadow of the past. And while we have discharged our duty as soldiers and fellow comrades, and can, when the end comes, leave with pride a record that you and I, and those who follow after across the sands of time—having taken up the burden where we laid it down and assumed in our stead the cares and responsibilities of life—need not be ashamed, yet our mission is not complete nor our task finished. There are many things yet for you and I to do, among which it remains for us to make a record as a citizen that will compare favorably with our record as a soldier. On the bloody field of Waterloo, where two mighty armies were engaged in mortal combat; on the result of which hung the destinies of two continents, and, as the two great bodies swayed too and fro amid the clash of arms; the shrieks of the wounded; the groans of the dying; the rattle of musketry; the cannon's deep roar, at a critical moment—by sheer force—the allied lines were forced back and broken. This was readily detected by the ever watchful eye of the great Napoleon, who to improve his advantage, sent his faithful lieutenant—the intrepid Ney—with his thirty thousand trained victors of a hundred battles. Just then the Duke of Wellington dashed into his broken, fleeing ranks when an old English soldier recognized him exclaimed: "Here is the Duke! God save the Duke," and the cry was taken up and carried along the lines. Thus encouraged the soldiers re-entered the battle with renewed energy, and that evening's sun set upon a victorious English army and the downfall of the great Napoleon. Fellow comrades, we are today engaged in another war and in the midst of a great battle—the battle of life. The air is full of death-dealing missiles, our friends are falling thick and fast around us. With the Blue and the Gray the war will soon be over. In our front arrayed in hostile attitude are the great enemies to civil and religious liberty—the key to the progress, welfare and prosperity of all governments—party strife, State jealousies and sectional animosities—in our midst and urging us on to victory. In the discharge of our human and christian duties we have the Great Commander, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Above the tumultuous roar of the conflict we hear his noble voice counciling meekness, moderation and forgiveness, that we may be forgiven. Again we hear the command: "Love thy neighbor as thyself," "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you." As did the soldier of Waterloo, let us take courage and form a resolution to do our whole duty to each other. As soldiers of the Blue and Gray let us discard and turn our backs upon all of the unpleasant differences that may have grown out of, or had their origin with the Civil War. The affairs of earth and time are but trivial and insignificant as compared with our duty to each other and posterity. As we prepare for the summons of our commander let us fall in for roll-call where there will be no Blue nor Gray around the camp fire over on the other shore. As there shall be none there let us have none here. On that great day set apart for decorating the graves of the dear ones departed; when we have paid the last sad tribute of respect to the memory of our dear comrades in Blue, let us also plant a little rose upon the graves of the Gray, for perhaps at that moment, in the far away sunny south, some kind and loving hand may be tenderly caring for the grave of your brother, your husband or your father. You ask why do I think so? and I answer: because I have been upon the battle field in the midst of the wounded and dying blue and gray, in company with the southern mother, and I have heard the dying boy in blue crying piteously: "Mother, Oh! my mother, if she were only here," and I have heard the southern mother say, while the tears chased each other down her noble cheeks, as she tenderly stroked his fevered brow: "Sonny, I will be your mother now." Comrades of the Blue and soldiers of the Gray, the day of our terrestial journey is coming to a close; we are nearing the end; the sun has passed the noon-day hour; evening is drawing its sable curtain about us, and we soon shall hear the sunset gun. Let us use the few remaining weeks, months or years, at most, in honoring our beloved dead and healing the wounds produced by the mere difference of opinion, involving brother against brother and father against son, by uniting in one general, joyous jollification over the glorious blessings that comes to you and I as citizens of the grandest government known to the civilized nations of the earth, as followers of a flag that is loved and honored from pole to pole. In penning these few lines I feel that I am voicing the sentiment of most or all of the true surviving soldiers of the Union army, and especially of the gallant old 18th Kentucky that went out in Sixty-one numbering nine hundred and eighty-five and returned in Sixty-five numbering two hundred and forty-one, leaving three-fourths of its members strewn over the battle fields of the south, mingling with the soil of almost every State of the late Confederacy; fathers, and mothers, sisters and brothers of the Confederates, while we are doing our duty in caring for the graves of our loved ones in Gray that have gone down on northern fields and out of northern prisons, plant a little rose upon the graves of the Blue for their brothers, sisters wives, fathers and mothers, and for me. Respectfully, W. C. SLEET,
Late 1st Lieut. 18th Ky. Infantry.
(THE END)

[Owensboro Messenger Aug. 19.]

If every property owner in Kentucky, individual and corporation; would return to the assessor the holdings of property on which he or it ought to pay taxes, the rate of state taxation could be cut more than in half. If every individual and corporation should do likewise with the cities of Kentucky, not a city of them all but what would be enabled to reduce its taxes one-half, and yet have ample funds with which to administer the government of the municipality as it ought to be administered—and the valuation of taxable property would not have to be increased one dollar.

But not all individuals and not all corporations make proper return of their taxable property to the authorities. There is one class of individuals which does make full return and which pays taxes on property promptly—and that is the class made up of men of small holdings. The result—for of the facts there is no dispute—is that the small property owner pays a proportion of taxes greatly in excess of the large property holder, whether individual, firm or corporation. It is among the wealthy individuals and among the wealthy corporations and firms that the tax dodger is found—and is there a man in all Kentucky who will openly say that the fact is otherwise? Is there a man in all Kentucky who will openly say that any man should escape payment of his just share of taxation, as his neighbor pays?

Kentucky is not an exception to the fact that the tax dodger is found in every state in the union, and that the tax dodger ought to be made to pay his taxes is a proposition too sound to be questioned. In order to compel the tax dodger to pay his taxes; in order to take the unjust burden of taxation from shoulders unable to bear it and to put it on shoulders on which it ought to be borne instead of being dodged, the legislature of Kentucky enacted appropriate legislation. Because of that enactment the treasury of the state has been enriched, and men who were concealing the property on which taxes were due but not paid, have been compelled to do their duty to the state, as their poorer neighbors were compelled to do. But there are yet many serious inequalities in the law.

To get at these inequalities and remedy them as speedily as possible the last legislature appointed a commission to draft a new revenue bill. This commission will meet in Owensboro today to hear the views of prominent business men on the subject of taxation. Other meetings will be held from time to time in other cities, and before the next session of the legislature the members of the commission should have some valuable recommendations to impart.

Notice—If the taxpayers of the county will prepare lists of their taxable property and have it ready for transfering to the schedule, when I or my deputy calls, my work will be expedited considerably. Please do this.

VOL. XXX. BURLINGTON, KENTUCKY, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1905. NO. 41

County Correspondence.

COMMISSARY.

Sept. 2.—When a man marries for money he earns every penny he gets.

Maurice Rice sold a horse to William Slayback Friday. Price, $60.

Bernard Rogers, near Bellevue, bought a mule of Xan Scott last Wednesday. Price, $160.

Tom Adams finished T. J. Walton's wire fence on Brandywine Thursday. Mr. Adams builds a good fence.

William Slayback, Sylvester Fleek, W. T. Ryle and Ed. Barres were callers at Commissary, last Sunday.

Benjamin Butler Bowser and wife attended the Johnson euchre party last week. Mrs. Bowser was champion.

Henry Ranes, of New Kentucky, visited in Bellevue and at Richard Louden's, last Saturday night and Sunday.

It is rumored that two of the Kentuckians that moved to Indiana will return to their old love as soon as they find a location.

Sylvester Fleek and wife, of Erlanger, at one time residents near here, were visiting in this vicinity last Saturday and Sunday.

H. P. Parsons and force are kept on the jump sawing tobacco sticks for farmers, many of whom find themselves short of sticks.

Billy Slayback bought some household furniture at the Lillard sale, and to the question what does it mean, he said, "I intend to marry as soon as I get my tobacco housed." Here's to you, Billy.

Large crowd at the Lillard sale Tuesday—estimated all the way from 500 to 1000, about one half of which were ladies. Everything brought fair prices, especially the cattle and horses. The farm was bid in by Mrs. Mary Johnson.

Mrs. Ed. Kelly returned, last Saturday, from a week's visit with relatives in the vicinity of Johnson's old mill on North Hogan, Ind., of which mention was made last week. She expressed herself as well pleased with the visit and the country.

Mrs. Gertie Parsons, of Cincinnati, who has been spending several weeks with H. P. Parsons and wife, of Middle creek, went to Indiana last Sunday and will visit her mother, Mrs. Sarah Popham, on South Hogan, until Wednesday, when she will return to her home and will be accompanied by her sister, Miss Ettie Popham.

Doney Cook, of Bellevue, an employe of the Mauer basket factory, has been ailing for sometime past, and he thinks too close confinment to the bench in a sitting position caused it. Mr. Cook thought country air and country grub, and a change of work, would be beneficial, so he is helping Dick Louden out and house tobacco.

Grand-mothers are sometimes startled by the up-to-dateness of their grandchildren. The other day one was telling her youngest grandchild, the story of Lot. She showed him the pictures of the wicked cities of the plains enveloped in the fire from heaven. Little Willie gazed at the pictured conflagration and asked: "Were they insured?"

Well, the Bartlett excursion was simply laid in the shade.

Florence was evidently the center of population, last week. A few hours observation there Saturday morning convinces the writer that human nature, when it goes on exhibition in Florence for a "good time," has all the ear-marks that human nature does the world over. It has its refined and elegant features that appeals to the senses of enjoyment and pleasures; it has its whoop-em-up, its rackel-em-tackle-em, bunko-buncket-um features. There is also ever present the Wild Bill from Bunker Hill; the "nigger baby" fiend; the three card fiend to tie working man, and a ring-tailed monkey with the organ band. Sich is life.

He was of a quiet unassuming disposition and has won for himself a host of friends. He possessed strong mental faculities and was well posted on the issues of the day. WILLIAM BATTERSON, Lecturer.

Notice—The Farmers Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Boone county will on the first Monday in October, 1905, at its office in Burlington hold its annual election for President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, Assessor and six directors. Those who desire their names printed on the ballots must inform the undersigned by September 20th, 1905.

MALCHUS SOUTHER, Secretary.

Mr. Stuart's speech here Monday stirred up considerable enthusiasm among the limited number of growers who heard him. Very few knew he intended to come, consequently his crowd was small. Had his appointment been properly advertised growers from all parts of the county would have been in attendance, and the work of the soliciting committee would have been rendered much easier. He is sanguine that the company will be a go.

The committee appointed by the tobacco growers' meeting last Monday will be busy all this week soliciting subscriptions of stock. Those who are on the inside claim that there is but little doubt of the success of the effort to organize the produces, so it behooves the grower who desires the success of the organization to not delay subscribing for such an amount of stock as he thinks he can handle. If the company can arrange to handle successfully, the 1905 crop it will have no trouble thereafter if conducted properly.

The will of Joseph Riddell was probated last Monday, and his widow qualified as administratrix with the will annexed. The will gives to Mrs. Carrie Setters during her life then to her heirs the farm on which she and her husband have resided for some time. In no event is any part of the real estate to be sold, not even a sale of a life estate thereto being permitted.

Last Wednesday afternoon J. H. Rogers and others were working on a road near Walton, his mules, attached to a wagon they were using, became frightened and started to run, when in attempting to catch them he was knocked down, the wagon wheels passing over his left leg, cutting an ugly gash in the flesh and breaking the bone between the knee and the ankle. Mr. Rogers is well known throughout the county, having been a candidate for county clerk in the last primary election.

Are You Engaged!

Engaged people should remember, that, after marriage, many quarrels can be avoided, by keeping their digestions in good condition with Electric Bitters. S. A. Brown, of Bennettsville, S. C., says: "For years, my wife suffered intensely from dyspepsia, complicated with a torpid liver, until she lost her strength and vigor, and became a mere wreck of her former self. Then she tried Electric Bitters, which helped her at once, and finally made her entirely well. She is now strong and healthy." Druggists, sells and guarantees them, at 50c a bottle.

James Crisler, who died at the home of his nephew, John N. Crisler, in Gunpowder neighborhood, last Saturday afternoon, was a son of the late Gabriel Crisler, and a native of this county. He was in his 72d year and had never married. James Crisler was a good citizen and a well informed man, and many years ago when the country debating society was so popular, he was regarded as about the strongest debater in the county, and the disputant who had him for a colleague in a forsenic encounter considered himself as fortunate. He has been known to go miles after night in the worst kind of winter weather to be present at a debate in some country school house, and he was always well prepared to meet his opponents on these occasions. He was a man of fixed opinions regarding all public affairs, and while of an unobtrusive nature he was ever ready to defend his position when challenged. He was an unfaultering Democrat and a firm believer in the doctrine of predestination, and an earnest Odd-Fellow of which order he had been a member for many years, and in the lodge room his wise counsel will be missed by his brethren, who mourn his death as do a host of other friends.

Resolved, That the Hon. George W. Leiberth's administration of the office of Collector of the 6th Internal Revenue District of Kentucky, has been fair and impartial to the country counties, and we heartily endorse his candidacy for reappointment.

The minutes of this convention are requested to be published in full in the Boone County Recorder, and anyother paper that may choose to copy the same.

B. W. KELLY, Chairman.
G. G. HUGHES, Secretary.

SENSATIONAL CAREER OF A REAL GIRL BANDIT

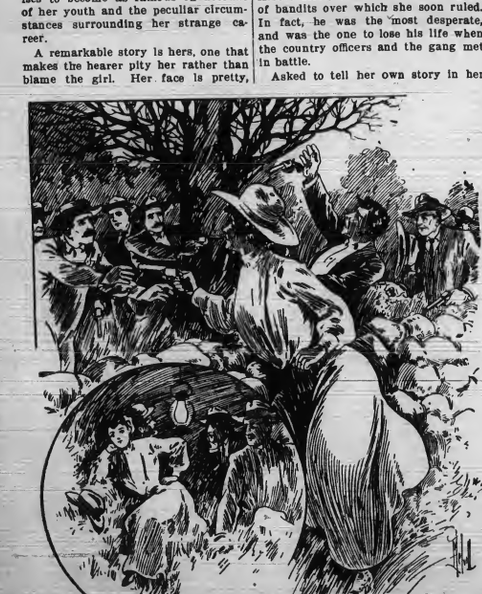
"QUEEN" OF A GANG WHICH OPERATED IN VERMONT—STORY OF THEIR CRIMES AND THEIR CAPTURE AFTER FIERCE BATTLE.

WHY LOVINA LANFEAR BECAME A ROBBER

Thought It "Couldn't Be Any Worse Than Working"—Evil Associates and Influences Work the Ruin of the Daughter of a Farm Hand.

Bennington, Vt.—Lovina Lanfear, a bandit queen at 18, is in the jail here. According to the officers, the girl is as desperate a character as ever roamed the hills of the Green Mountain state. The capture of the gang with which she was associated seems to bear out their assertion, for the girl and her pals were taken prisoners after a desperate battle, in which one man lost his life.

Lovina Lanfear is in the same cell in which Mrs. Mary Rogers awaited trial for the murder of her husband. Mrs. Rogers' case attracted world-wide attention because of the brutality of the crime of which she was found guilty. The Lanfear girl's case promises to become as famous on account of her youth and the peculiar circumstances surrounding her strange career.



A remarkable story is hers, one that makes the hearer pity her rather than blame the girl. Her face is pretty, but her life has left its marks upon her features, and the blue eyes that might have glanced with tenderness are now shifty and cruel, the mouth is set, and there are no roses in her cheeks, while her golden hair is tossed tawdrily over a frowning brow. She came to the jail in rags, but has been given good clothes, yet she wears them with none of that pride with which a woman usually wears finery. Lovina Lanfear, in short, is a good example of the degradation to which a young girl open to evil influences can sink.

The girl bandit is the daughter of a farmhand, her birthplace being in Dorset, a near-by hamlet in the hills. "Vinie," as she is called, was brought up in poverty and vice. Her mother was weak, simple and careless of her children's well being, while the father was a brute almost passing description.

Last September she was married to a young man named Martin Westcott, who amounted to little. The girl is the mother of a child cared for at present by "Vinie's" family.

Her married life was short, and when she and her husband tired of living together they simply separated. After she left Westcott the girl met Albert Ross, a member of the gang of bandits over which she soon ruled. In fact, he was the most desperate, and was the one to lose his life when the country officers and the gang met in battle.

Asked to tell her own story in her own way, she does so willingly, and with a freedom that in an innocent girl would be taken as naivete, but in her case can be called nothing but abandon.

"Certainly I'm guilty of being with the gang," she says, "though you couldn't call us bandits. We didn't do anything so horrible, and if we'd been let alone we'd have got away without causing any harm except taking what we needed when we could find it.

"Everybody around here knows me. I was born near Dorset, and went to the district school. I didn't care much for it, and used to stay away when I could. Father and mother care? Not they.

"I married Westcott, but we didn't get along, so we just quit.

"I didn't care, because he tried to make me stay in the house nights when he was away, and I didn't want to. I like to enjoy life. Well, when he told me to go away from him, I went. I stayed at home a little while, and then met a fellow named Albert Ross, who was clerking at the Putnam house in Bennington.

"We kept company, Al and I, and he worked at the hotel and over at the golf links at Manchester-in-the-Mountains. But finally we got tired of living around here, and thought we'd get out.

"The first night it was dark, and I got tired; so Al and I went into a barn to sleep till morning. We didn't know there was anyone in there, but we had hardly got inside when we heard our names called, and, looking up in the haymow, saw my cousin, Merritt Reed, and a friend named Dan Brockway.

"When Al and I saw the fellows we wanted to know what they were doing there, and Reed told me that he and Brockway had given up their jobs and were going to be burglars. They had just robbed a store at Dorset and two or three houses, and they showed us a diamond ring, a watch, some other rings and a whole lot of stuff they had stolen and were hiding in the barn.

"When I told them Al and I were going away they asked me why we didn't join them. They said it would be a good thing for a gang to have a woman along, as she could do jobs that they would be caught trying. They offered me an equal share of everything, and said they would make me the 'queen' of the gang.

"Al didn't like the idea, but I said: 'Come along. It can't be any worse than working.' So he agreed to join, too, and we slept till morning.

"Early in the morning we left the barn and started north. Reed was armed, I knew, for he had shown me two big pistols, one of which he gave me. I don't know about the others, except that Al had a knife that he said he could use in close quarters if we got caught at anything. We walked all day, laying plans as to what we should do, and that night slept in the woods, making our beds of pine boughs. We were hungry, so I raided a hen roost near by, and that, with some veal that Reed stole, made our supper.

"The next day we went on to Pawlet, and that night we cleaned out a farmer's hen roost and all his clothes lines. Again we slept in a barn, and next morning tramped on to Granville.

"Our plans were not quite ready for the big trick we were going to try, which was the robbery of a bank in Manchester. We were not armed enough, and we didn't know the arrangements, so we decided to stay in Granville for a little while. So we stopped at the hotel over night. But the next day we thought we'd better go back, as it was rumored that we were being watched, and we didn't want to get caught and jailed for the simple little things we had already done. Besides, there was a jewelry store at South Dorset, kept by a man named Abrams. I thought it would be easy to get in there, and besides getting some diamonds, take what pistols and ammunition we might need for bigger work.

"It was a dark night, and we didn't expect we'd have any trouble over the Abrams trick. It was arranged that the boys should stand guard while I got into the store and cleaned it out. So I was to take the pistol that Reed had given me and protect myself if they didn't warn me in case of anyone coming, or if I should run across anybody in the store. About nine o'clock that night we got near North Dorset, where the jewelry store was and were just going down the road toward it when a team drove over a bridge that we would have to cross over a little stream.

"We tried to get out of their way, for none of us thought the team was after us. But the men in the wagon had lanterns, and I saw that we were discovered. We had been followed. I yelled to the boys to run for their lives.

"I recognized some of the men in the wagon as they began to jump out, among them Constable A. C. Mason, of Pawlet, and a farmer named Black, near whose house we were overtaken.

"Merritt Reed ran first, and Ross right after him, but I didn't see where Brockway went. I wasn't going to run, thinking that the officers would follow the men and I could sneak away quietly. Besides, I wanted to see how Al Ross would come out of the scrape, and, if possible, help him. As soon as Constable Mason struck the ground he drew a revolver and commenced firing. Then I drew mine, intending to use it if they fired at me.

"But before I could get a chance to fire I felt arms about me, and Farmer Black had me pinioned. At the same time Reed, who was being followed by Constable Mason, turned and fired at him. I yelled for Al to help me, and he turned to come up the little hill down which he had run. As he did he must have got in line with Reed's revolver, for he suddenly threw up his hands and yelled: 'I'm killed!' Then he fell to the ground.

"Al's death made me wild. I fought and kicked to get free, and if I had I would have killed some one. But there was no one to kill, at that, for the constable's posse was a pack of cowards, and only one man besides Mason himself stood ground. That was Farmer Black, who caught me. The rest ran for dear life as soon as a shot was fired.

"Reed and Brockway got away during the excitement. Al was killed, though he gave the constable a good tussle right in front of me before he fell back dead. Then they carried his body to a little schoolhouse near by and took me to Farmer Black's for the night.

"They caught Brockway next day in the next town, but they haven't got Reed, and if I'd had any chance to get away they wouldn't have got me, either. Al has been buried in the pauper's graveyard at Pawlet. What they'll do with me I don't know. What do I care, anyway?"

Such is the story of Lovina Lanfear. Not highly romantic, as she tells it, but, from the very manner of its relation, a remarkable illustration of what a girl can become who is given her own way and allowed to run fast and free, even in so civilized a community as a New England state.

She will not be tried as a principal for the murder of Ross, for which Reed will be arraigned. The robbery charges against the gang will probably be prosecuted, though Lovina may be used only as a witness against the others.

NUNS STARTED FASHION.

Struck by Novel Effect Fashionable Dames Adopted the Custom of Powdering Hair.

The custom of powdering the hair dates back as far as the sixteenth century and was first introduced by the nuns in French convents. Those who had occasion to leave the cloisters for any reason were wont to powder their hair so as to make it appear gray and give them a venerable look. The fashionable dames were so struck with the novel effect of white powder on dark hair that they soon appropriated the device as one of the arts of the worldly toilet. Out of this grew the use of tints in the hair. The Roman women often used blue powder and later, in 1860, Empress Eugenie set the fashion of using gold powder.

Rome under the empire and Greece during the time of Pericles were seized with a mania for golden hair. The belles and fops of the day devised several methods whereby black locks might be changed to golden yellow, but bleaching did not always succeed. Consequently quite a trade was established with the fair-haired tribes beyond the Alps, who sold their locks to Latin merchants, to be worn on the heads of Roman dandies.

Many a dame dampened her raven tresses in the strongest of muriatic acid and sat in the sun to bleach her hair to the coveted yellow. Others used lye and afterward anointed their heads with oil made from goat fat, ashes of the beech tree and certain yellow flowers.

The itinerant barber, who passed down and out when people ceased to use powder in their hair, was quite a personage in his day. He went from house to house, armed with a soap bowl to fit the chin, powder boxes, pomatum and puffs, was always a newsmonger and a gratuitous scandal bearer.

When wigs were in vogue the Roman dames had in their wardrobes as many wigs as costumes, and when the choice of a wig was made it was necessary to arrange the eyebrows, lashes and complexion in harmony. It was then that the claves were specially charged with the makeup of the face—a delicate operation, called by Cicero "Medicaments candoris et ruboris."

There were some cunning devices in vogue among the belles of the old world for giving expression to the eye. The most reckless of them were wont to place a single drop of that deadly poison, prussic acid, in the bottom of a wine glass and hold it against the eyes for two or three seconds. Or, more rashly still, they would take a small quantity—a piece not larger than a grain of rice—of an ointment containing that mortal drug, atropia, and rub it on the brow. Each of these was supposed to give clearness and brilliancy, expand the pupil and impart a fascinating fullness and mellowness to the eye. Certain slightly pungent and volatile perfumes, such as oil of thyme, were occasionally worn on the handkerchief, causing the eyes to glitter and sparkle. The eye was made to appear large, full and almond shaped by the use of a fine pencil dipped in antimonical sulphur or Egyptian black, rubbed upon the lids along the angle.

But, after all, the surest means by which a woman may acquire and preserve the gift of pleasing it to be young in spirit if not in years and every bit as pretty as is possible with all the legitimate means at her command. If she is always kind and gentle, always ready to give to others the sunniest side of her nature.

Vanity.

Miss Frances Keller, of the Women's Municipal League of New York, illustrated admirably at a recent dinner party a point which she wished to make in reply to a man who had said "women are vainer than men." "Of course," Miss Keller answered, "I admit that women are vain and men are not. There are a thousand proofs that this is so. Why, the necktie of the handsomest man in the room is even now up the back of his collar." There were six men present and each of them put his hand gently behind his neck.—Philadelphia Ledger.

THE WAITER WAS CURIOUS.

Poked His Hand Into a Bag of "Crab-Apples" with Disastrous Result.

Four men carrying a big potato sack escorted them, walked into the Hotel Vendig cafe, at Twelfth and Market streets, shortly before closing time the other night, and sat down at one of the tables. The bag was carefully deposited in a corner, relates the Philadelphia Press.

A German waiter took the order with one eye on the sack. Finally his curiosity got the better of him.

"Dot is a big bag, ain't it?" he said. "Vot is in him?"

"Apples, Fritz," said one of the men. "Take some home to the children."

The waiter accepted the invitation and plunged his hand into the sack. He brought it out again in a hurry, with a hard-shell crab clinging to one of his fingers.

Two hundred brothers and sisters of the first crab promptly took advantage of the open mouth of the bag to crawl to liberty. They backed out of the sack with a rush and took possession of the cafe, nipping everything in reach. Several seized trouser legs and shoestrings and held fast.

Heroic waiters made a sortie with brooms and swept the crustaceans back into the bag and tied it up securely.

"Say, please," demanded the German waiter, sucking vigorously at his injured finger, "vot kind of abbles do you call dose?"

"Crab-apples," said the four men, in chorus.

HOW TO TELL A STATESMAN

Not Only a Man Who Makes Speeches, But a Man Who Makes Good Ones.

The late Horatio G. Herrick, of Lawrence, for many years high sheriff of Essex county, always took a keen interest in the Lawrence schools, and was for a long time chairman of the school committee. Visiting the Saunders school soon after the death of Garfield, relates the Boston Herald, Sheriff Herrick spoke to the pupils of the life of the late distinguished statesman, and thus asked, genially:

"Now, can any of you tell me what a statesman is?"

A little hand went up, and a little girl replied:

"A statesman is a man who makes speeches."

"Hardly that," answered Mr. Herrick, who loved to tell this story. "For instance, I sometimes make speeches, and yet I am not a statesman."

The little hand again went up, and the answer came, triumphantly:

"I know; a statesman is a man who makes good speeches!"

Ambiguous.

"I must compliment you on the remarkable lightness of your bread," said the woman customer.

"Thank you," rejoined the baker. "It is my aim to turn out the lightest bread in the city."

"Yes," continued the woman customer, "and if you get it much lighter it will take two of your pound loaves to weigh 16 ounces."—Stray Stories.

FEVER'S AFTER-EFFECTS

Did Not Disappear Until the Blood Was Renewed by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

Typhoid fever is sometimes called nervous fever. During the course of the fever the nerves are always profoundly disturbed, and when it is over they are left so sensitive that the patient has to be guarded against all excitement. In the tonic treatment then demanded, regard must be paid not only to building up flesh but also to strengthening the nerves. A remedy that will do both, make sound flesh to repair waste and give new vigor to feeble nerves, is the most convenient and economical. Such a remedy is Dr Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

One proof of this is the experience of Mr. Charles Worth, of East Vassalboro, Maine. He says: "I had a severe attack of typhoid fever late in the fall which left me very weak and debilitated. My heart palpitated, my breathing became difficult after the least exertion and there was numbness in both hands. I suffered in that way for fully six months. As I did not grow out of it, did not in fact see the slightest improvement as time passed, I decided to use Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as I knew of some ones they had effected in cases like mine.

"Almost as soon as I began taking them I could see decided improvement and after keeping on with them for several weeks I was completely well. I consider Dr. Williams' Pink Pills a most valuable remedy, and I am in the habit of recommending them to others afflicted as I was."

When the nerves ache and tremble it means that they are starving. The only way to feed them is through the blood, and the best food is Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. They are absolutely guaranteed to be free from opiates or other harmful drugs. They are sold by all druggists, or may be obtained directly from the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

JACOB AT HARAN

PART II.—Love's Severe Test.

OUR BIBLE STORY by the Highway and Byway" Preacher

Scripture Authority.—"And Laban said unto Jacob, because thou art my brother, shouldest thou therefore serve me for naught? Tell me, what shall thy wages be? And Laban had two daughters; the name of the elder was Leah, and the name of the younger was Rachel. Leah was tender eyed; but Rachel was beautiful and well-favored. And Jacob loved Rachel; and said, I will serve thee seven years for Rachel thy younger daughter. And Laban said It is better that I give her to thee, than that I should give her to another man; abide with me. And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her. —Gen. 29:15-20.

JACOB could not sleep that night. In truth he did not care to, so sweet and delightful were his thoughts, for they centered about the girl with whom he had walked home that evening and whose tender assurances that she had missed him still echoed and re-echoed through his heart. When he had departed from home and his father had charged him to take a wife of the daughters of his mother's brother, he had thought little of it; in fact his mind had been so filled with the fear of his brother's threat that his going was prompted by anxiety for his own safety rather than the sentimental one of marriage.

Once or twice on the long journey to Haran his father's last words had recurred to him and his cool, calculating, grasping nature had led him to scheme how the taking of a wife might be to his advantage. No thought of love or sentiment. Such feelings seemed quite foreign to his nature. He approached the subject of marriage just as he might have considered a trade in cattle or sheep, or the purchase of a new mantle or rug from some Egyptian trader. How could he get the best of the bargain? How could he make the most out of it for Jacob? Such had been his feelings prior to his coming to Haran and meeting the fair Rachel. And now the scheming, crafty, grasping Jacob had given place to a new Jacob, with a real heart of flesh and blood.

He arose and passed out into the night. The soft glow of the moon, the cheery flashing of the myriad stars, the gentle murmur of the breezes, and the contented chirping and buzz of the insects, all seemed to be in friendly harmony with his own thoughts and spirit. A new sympathy seemed to awaken in his heart to the nature about him, and as he drew near the place where the night before he had so unexpectedly met Rachel, he paused and exclaimed fervently:

"How beautiful it all is. How delightful is this place."

He threw himself on the ground at the foot of the tree, where he had sat the night before. It almost seemed he could feel again the touch of Rachel's hand, and hear her softly-spoken words of welcome.

"She shall be mine," he broke out, as though in answer to the yearning of his heart. "I will ask Laban for her hand in marriage on the morrow. But," he continued, as his brow clouded, "what have I to offer? No treasure of gold or silver or precious stones. No cattle."

And his mind went back to the abundance which his father possessed.

"Oh, why did they send me empty away? Why, if they wished me to take a wife, did they not provide suitable gifts? Must I come like a beggar?" And Jacob, now thoroughly miserable in the face of the new difficulty, arose impatiently and paced back and forth. He could not go back home, for fear of Esau. What could he do? Must he give up his Rachel?

At that moment a commotion in the direction of the sheepfold caught his attention. Instantly all the instincts of the careful, faithful shepherd were aroused with him.

With the sheep in peril he never gave a thought to the danger to himself, but sprang into the inclosure, while he took a fresh grip upon his club. Already three sheep lay bleeding on the ground, and the tawny form of the lion could be seen on the other side fiercely tearing at a fourth and sucking its life's blood. Its tail swished back and forth on the ground defiantly, and its blazing eyes, like balls of fire, watched Jacob as he fearlessly advanced. With an angry roar it sprang into the air to meet its new foe. Jacob braced himself, and swinging his knotted club with all his might he caught the beast on one of its forelegs, breaking it and sweeping its great body to one side just enough to miss striking him. With a terrible howl of rage and pain it turned and in spite of its disabled leg it again leaped forward. Again the swish of the club sounded, and this time the aim was truer and it came crashing down upon the skull of the lion with such tremendous force that the bone was shattered. But the blow was not sufficient to check the momentum of the huge body, and before Jacob could spring to one side it struck him, and he fell to the ground, with the lion on top of him. That was the last Jacob knew until he found himself lying on the cot in his tent, with the anxious faces of the family bending over him.

"Feeling better now?" Laban asked, anxiously. "That was a close call you had."

"What is the matter? What has happened?" Jacob asked in confusion, looking from one face to another, as he raised himself on his elbow. Then like a flash the memory of the struggle in the sheepfold came to him, and he asked, eagerly:

"And the lion?"

"Dead," ejaculated Laban. "That was a finishing blow that you gave him. But he left some pretty vicious digs with his claws during his death struggles."

"Well, no bones are broken, anyway," Jacob rejoined, struggling to his feet and swinging his arms and his legs by way of testing. "Nothing worse than a few bruises and ugly scratches."

"Oh, Jacob, I am so thankful," sobbed Rachel, smiling through her tears.

"How came you out by the sheepfold?" broke in Laban, curiously.

The question carried Jacob back to the meditations of the night before. He did not know what to answer. In confusion he looked from Rachel's face to that of Laban, and at last blurted out:

"I was thinking—thinking—about going home," he finished up, his courage failing him to tell the exact truth.

Laban's face fell and disappointment was in his voice as he hastily rejoined:

"Nay, nay, abide here. Thou canst not do better. Because thou art my brother, shouldest thou therefore serve me for naught? Tell me, what shall thy wages be?"

"Wages?" thought Jacob. He raised his eyes to those of Rachel, who was looking at him appealingly, and a happy thought struck him.

"I will serve thee for Rachel, thy younger daughter," he exclaimed, boldly.

"Well, it is better that I give her to thee, than that I should give her to another man," and then added: "But how long shall thy service be?"

What could Jacob say? He could not bargain for his beloved Rachel as he would for a camel or a sheep. Love must name a goodly price.

"I will serve thee seven years," he said.

"Seven years?" responded Laban, quickly, wondering if he had heard correctly. "Be it as thou hast said," and he chuckled to himself as he walked away, leaving the family group in embarrassed silence.

"And you're going to stay!" whispered Rachel, as she came to Jacob's side.

"For you," he responded, eagerly.

"Oh, I'm so happy," and the fair Rachel blushed prettily, and then, noting the frown on her mother's face, she hurried away and busied herself with her morning work.

Jacob's eyes followed her. What was that? A sob? He turned and caught a fleeting glimpse of Leah as she disappeared in her mother's tent, but he was too happy to wonder long, for Rachel was betrothed to him and the years would soon slip by. But the crafty Jacob was to learn many a lesson in sharp dealing at the hands of the crafter Laban. Over and over again was he reminded of his own subtlety in dealing with his brother and father by some sharp practice at the hands of Laban. But despite the hardships, despite the exactions of his grasping master, the years passed swiftly. The glimpses he had of his fair Rachel and the occasional smile and bit of conversation on his brief visits to Laban's home after the long seasons in the distant valleys with the sheep and cattle were like the refreshing oases in the desert to the traveler, and made him patient in his service.

Under his wise, faithful care the flocks and herds of Laban increased until the man became very rich. Five years, six years went by and the seventh had begun.

"Ah, my love," Jacob said, gayly, as he departed after one of his brief visits, "only a few more months now, and I shall claim thee as my bride."

Laban overheard the words as he was sitting in the shadow of his tent, and he muttered to himself:

"Not if Laban knows it. Seven years are too little, anyway." And, rising, he sought out his wife and had a long talk with her.

"And Leah shall be given to him instead of Rachel? Thy plan is good. I will manage it." And Laban's wife smiled cunningly as she resumed her work and Laban departed.

"Seven more years, Jacob? Ah, I feared thy love would not endure the test."

"My love, I care not now, now that I have thee. The seven years I served for thee seemed as but a few days, because of my love for thee, and now with thee at my side, my chosen bride, think you, Rachel, that seven more years will not quickly pass?"

They stood in the spot where seven years before they had met. Like a dreadful nightmare seemed the week which had just passed—the cruel deception, the separation, the days of doubt and suffering. Those were dark days. In fierce anger Jacob had chided Laban for his duplicity, and Rachel, shut in the retreat where her mother had placed her, had raved like a mad woman, and mourned her Jacob as lost to her. But the sunshine had broken through the clouds at last and Jacob had claimed her as his wife, after he had promised the designing, avaricious Laban that he would serve yet seven other years for Rachel. And now Jacob was going with his flocks again to begin another seven years of servitude; but as they stood there—Jacob with his strong arm encircling Rachel's fair form, and Rachel lifting her beautiful face and smiling with joyful eyes into his—the future looked bright and they were full of hope, for they had each other.

"Jacob, do you remember your ladder, and the angels, and God's promise?"

"Yea, love, and some day we shall go back and possess the land of which God spoke."

ANOTHER KICKER ARISES.

Futile Protest Against the Tariff from Voters of Republican Ticket.

When they begin to kick about the tariff in such a rockribbed republican state as Maine the stand-patters better take warning. The action of the Portland board of trade, at its last meeting, "brings the question of tariff revision and reciprocity to the fore again," declares the Press (rep.) of that city. "The board adopted resolutions that the commercial interests of this section demanded a revision such as to allow an interchange of products with foreign countries on lines mutually beneficial and that the board join with other trade associations in New England in recommending such revision and request the Maine delegation to use its influence toward the passage of a revised tariff bill."

But what is the use of kicking up a rumpus in the ranks of the "corrupt old party" about economic subjects about which there is a difference of opinion, as President Roosevelt tells us. Speaker Cannon and the republican leaders have determined to stand pat and brazen it out.

If the Mainettes feel the pinch of trust high prices they must look for relief elsewhere than by a republican-controlled congress, and it would be a safe bet that five out of six of the Maine delegation in congress will vote on the trust side of any proposition that comes up, and rely on trust and corporation campaign funds to see them through. If the city of Portland wants tariff revision she must show her good faith by electing a representative to congress who will require no resolutions of instructions to keep him in line for tariff reform and it will not do to send a republican either. The republican managers in congress have a simple way of holding a caucus of the members of the G. O. P. and the majority declare that they must all "stand pat," and woe to the recalcitrant member that kicks out of the traces. This instruction by caucus is a form of "government by injunction" that is quite as effective as the court's issue against a labor union at the petition of a corporation, and the punishment for disobeying is quite as effective as far as results are concerned. It's no good kicking; if you will vote the republican ticket you must take your medicine until you get another chance at the ballot box.

THEY ABANDON REVISION.

President Roosevelt Has Surrendered to the Machinations of Stand-Patters.

Republican reciprocity advocates would seem to be liable to disappointment in their efforts to convert a stand-pat congress into one of achievement. "Revising the tariff by treaty" with foreign countries is not favored by the house of representatives, who believe it encroaches on their constitutional right to originate all revenue legislation. The senate has so many republican members that are interested in protecting manufacturing corporations from any cut in tariff rates that reciprocity treaties have been pigeon-holed. The very few republican members of congress who favor revising the tariff, or have promised their constituents to vote for tariff reform and who supposed they would have the moral backing of President Roosevelt and his recommendation to congress for tariff revision, are again to be disappointed, if current reports from Washington are to be believed. That usually well informed newspaper, the Washington Post, declares that President Roosevelt has yielded to the stand-patters and despairs of tariff revision during his administration, and further says:

"Stand-patters are rejoicing that they have virtually won the president to their way of thinking about revision, and it is beginning to look as though the agitation this winter for revision will come almost solely from within democratic ranks."

The republican party is so dependent upon the campaign fund donations of the protected monopolies, and its leaders in congress are so indebted to the trusts and combines that the tariff protects, that those influences are stronger with them than the demands of the people for relief from trust high prices. The voters have depended upon President Roosevelt to use his enormous power upon congress to force that body to pass a reasonable tariff revision measure, and if they find their champion has deserted them and left them to the tender mercies of the trusts for at least two years longer they may rebel and choose a democratic congress next year.

——The press dispatches announce that Chief Wilkie, of the secret service bureau of the treasury, has returned to Washington from a long trip to China and Japan on government business. The secret service bureau was established to prevent counterfeiting in this country, and what it can possibly have to do in the orient is a mystery. These expressive jaunts at public expense are a form of graft that need investigation.

——Col. Rizer, acting chief of the geological survey, denies there is any grafting in that bureau, but the facts seem to show that some of the special scientists connected with the bureau have been using their talents and time, paid for by the government, in editing the Mining World, for which it is claimed they also receive compensation. Prof. Wolcott, director of the bureau, appears to be summering in the west at government expense when his oversight of the bureau at Washington would seem to be much needed to investigate the work of his subordinates.

Only Too True.

A small girl who had just begun to have "nature study" in school was telling her mother recently some of the things she had learned. Her mother listened with interest, and finally asked: "Can you tell me the name of the poor worm mamma gets her silk dresses from?"

The child pondered deeply, and then said, suddenly:

"Oh, I know! From papa."—N. Y. Times.

Cause of Defeat.

One of the candidates at a recent election in Derbyshire, England, was a newcomer not remarkable for his generosity. He found himself defeated at the polls, and bade adieu to the electors with the words: "At any rate, ladies and gentlemen, my wife and I have spent a very happy fortnight in the Peak." "Yes," came a sudden retort from the crowd, "and that's all you have spent."

Mammoth Rope.

The biggest rope ever used for haulage purposes has just been made for a district subway in Glasgow. It is seven miles long, four and five-eighths inches in circumference and weighs nearly 60 tons. It has been made in one unjoined and unspliced length of patent crucible steel. When in place it will form a complete circle around Glasgow, crossing the Clyde in its course, and will run at a speed of 15 miles an hour.

Pleasant Prospect.

Bobby—Won't you be glad, Mr. Roaptin, when you marry my sister, an' won't have to go crooked any more when you walk?

Mr. Roaptin—Why, what do you mean? I don't walk crooked.

"Well, I heard sis tell me that she'd make you walk straight when she married you. An' ma said she'd help her!"—Stray Stories.

Overland Mail.

A forty-years-ago item in the Leavenworth Times says: "On Monday next the daily overland mail will start from here to San Francisco. They expect to make the trip in 18 days. This is one of the most gigantic enterprises ever undertaken in any part of this country, but under the able management of William H. Russell no one can doubt for its complete success."

Expected Pay.

An extremely unintelligent Philadelphia "repeater" was arrested at the last election in the Quaker city. He asked what crime was laid at his door, and the policeman replied: "You are charged with voting twice." "Charged, am I?" muttered the razed prisoner. "Why, I expected to be paid for it."

Where Germany Leads.

The French board of trade publishes a table which shows that Germany has 242,000 employes in the postal telegraph and telephone service. The United States comes next, with 239,000, followed by England, with 184,000, while France has only 81,600.

Hoping It's Her Last.

"That's her own composition," said a High School girl to the boy near her when her friend was playing the piano

"Really?" asked the boy.

"Yes, really."

"Well, let us hope it's her valedictory!"—Yonkers Statesman.

Same Boy Three Times.

A custom house officer at Yarmouth, England, the other day saved the life of a boy who had got off a quay into the sea, and found he was a boy whose life he had saved in a similar manner twice before.

NEW ROUTE TO SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

Through Trains from Chicago.

With the opening of the line across southern Utah and southwest Nevada, known as the San Pedro Route, a new country has been opened, which is area large enough for a good sized empire, the natural resources of which are practically untouched. This region has until now been without railway facilities, and the laws of trade and transportation are such that rapid development is now assured. The Tonopah and Goldfield mining camps are to be reached by branch lines, and there is a strong possibility that other mineral districts will be discovered and developed as a result of this new enterprise.

The facilities with which Southern California and this newly opened portion of Nevada can be reached in future are indicated by the announcement from the passenger department of the Chicago & North-Western R'y that a daily service of through Pullman tourist sleeping cars via this route is to be inaugurated between Chicago and Los Angeles in a few days, which will doubtless lead to a large influx of people looking for opportunities to establish themselves in this new country, where homes are cheap, work is plentiful, and men of vim and grit are in demand—something unknown in the densely populated cities of the east.

There is some beautiful scenery along the new route, particularly in what is known as Rainbow Canon; and the citrus fruit region of Southern California is reached near San Bernardino, the road leading from that point through Riverside and Pomona, and other towns in one of the greatest orange growing districts in the world.

It is expected that with the opening of the Southern California tourist season this fall, a large amount of travel will be handled via this route, for the management of the new road, fully alive to modern travel requirements, have put in effect a very handsome service of modern vestibule trains, with high class dining car service and other travel comforts, which connect at Salt Lake and Ogden with through service from the East, and give a new and interesting route by which first class tourist travel can reach the sunshine and flowers of this New World Riviera.

SENATOR SULLIVAN

Says He Has Found Doan's Kidney Pills Invaluable in Treating Sick Kidneys.

Hon. Timothy D. Sullivan, of New York, Member of Congress from the Eighth New York District, and one of the Democratic leaders of New York State, strongly recommends Doan's Kidney Pills.

Senator Sullivan writes:

It is a pleasure to endorse a remedy like Doan's Kidney Pills, having found them of greatest value in eliminating the distress caused by sick kidneys, and in restoring those organs to a condition of health. My experience with your valuable remedy was equally as gratifying as that of several of my friends. Yours truly, (Signed) TIMOTHY D. SULLIVAN.

Doctor Brigham Says

MANY PHYSICIANS PRESCRIBE

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

The wonderful power of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound over the diseases of womankind is not because it is a stimulant, not because it is a palliative, but simply because it is the most wonderful tonic and reconstructor ever discovered to act directly upon the generative organs, positively curing disease and restoring health and vigor.

Marvelous cures are reported from all parts of the country by women who have been cured, trained nurses who have witnessed cures and physicians who have recognized the virtue of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in severe cases of female ills, as they know by experience it can be relied upon to effect a cure. The following letter proves it.

Dr. S. C. Brigham, of 4 Brigham Park, Fitchburg, Mass., writes:

"It gives me great pleasure to say that I have found Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound very efficacious, and often prescribe it in my practice for female difficulties.

"My oldest daughter found it very beneficial for uterine trouble some time ago, and my youngest daughter is now taking it for a female weakness, and is surely gaining in health and strength.

"I freely advocate it as a most reliable specific in all diseases to which women are subject, and give it honest endorsement."

Women who are troubled with painful or irregular menstruation, bloating (or flatulence), leucorrhœa, falling, inflammation or ulceration of the uterus, ovarian troubles, that bearing-down feeling, dizziness, faintness, indigestion, nervous prostration or the blues, should take immediate action to ward off the serious consequences, and be restored to perfect health and strength by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and then write to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass., for further free advice. No living person has had the benefit of a wider experience in treating female ills. She has guided thousands to health. Every suffering woman should ask for and follow her advice if she wants to be strong and well.

BOONE CO.. RECORDER
Wednesday, - - Sept., 6, 1905.
W. L. RIDDELL, - - Publisher.

[Written for the Kentucky Farmer and Breeder by John Goff, Esq., Goff Home Farm, Indian Fields, Kentucky.]

The first woman to own a piece of Land in Kentucky, was Susannah Boone daughter of Daniel Boone, who very early obtained a patent for a tract in Madison county.

The first marriage in Kentucky was that of Samuel Henderson to Elizabeth Callaway, August 7, 1776. Their daughter, Fannie, born in 1777, was the first white child in the State, born of parents married in the State.

The first plow stock manufactured in Kentucky was made by William Poague, at Harrodsburg, in 1776. He also made the first loom, while his wife brought the first spinning wheel to the State and wove from the lint of nettles the first piece of linen manufactured, and from buffalo wool the first piece of linsey.

The first grist mill in the State run by water was, perhaps, one built by Capt. John McMurtry, near Shakertown in Mercer county, in 1782.

The first paper mill in Kentucky was erected by Elijah Craig near Georgetown, in 1792.

The first apple seeds were planted in Mercer county by members of the McAfee Company in 1775. Dr. Walker and his companions planted the first peach seeds and raised the first crop of corn cultivated by white men near Barbourville in 1770.

The first wagon of which history gives any account, was run over Smith's wagon road from Lexington to Maysville in 1783 by a man named Smith.

The first steamboat, or model of one, in the world, was constructed by John Fitch at Lexington in 1785.

The first railroad—about one mile length—was built by James A. Sikes and Jacob Van Meter in 1832. The cars were drawn by horses.

The first horses were brought to the State in 1750 by Dr. Walker; the first cattle and hogs by Boone and his companions in 1775.

The first lawyer in Kentucky was John Williams, manager of the Transylvania Company.

The first Englismen who visited Kentucky were those under the leadership of Col. Wood, who, in 1654, explored the northern bounday of the State.

The first Frenchmen to view any portion of the State were a small band of fur traders, who, in 1673, traveleb in canoes down the Mississippi as far as the mouth of the Arkans.

The first white native American to visit Kentucky was John Salling, of Virginia, who, in 1730, was carried a prisoner by the Indians through the State.

The first white woman that ever saw Kentucky was Mrs. Mary Ingel, who, in 1756, was carried as a prisoner by the Indians to Big Bone Lick in Boone county.

The first Dutchmen to visit Kentucky were a small company which established the White Oak Settlement in Madison county.

The first settlement of Frenchmen in the State was established at a point opposite the mouth of the Scioto river, in 1730.

The first house built by Englishmen was Dr. Walker's cabin on Cumberland river in 1750.

The first permanent English settlement was at Harrodsburg in 1775.

The first court in the State was held in Harrodsburg in 1777.

The first road in the State was Boone's trace.

The first store in Kentucky was that of the Transylvania Company at Harrodsburg.

The first school at Boonesboro was taught by Joseph Doniphan in 1779.

The first sermon preached in Kentucky was delivered by Rev. John Lythe, of the Church of England, in 1775.

The first ferry was established at Boouesboro, in 1775.

The first county seat in Kentucky was that of Lincoln county, established at Harrodsburg.

The first law for the establshment of public schools was passed in 1838.

Paducah has a "hoss" case in court which promises to be extremely interesting. A man had a mare worth $800. She injured herself in such a way that it was decided to kill her. The owner hired a negro to take her to the country and kill her. The negro sold her for $2 and came back and reported that he had killed her and was paid $2 for the job. The former owner has discovered his mare, which is in fine condition and again worth money, her purchaser having cured her. He demands possession and damages for her detention. The present owner denies the claim of the former owner, but asks $500 for the trouble and expense of careing for her.

James W. Parrish, Woodford county's largest tobacco grower, whose entire crop of 185 acres of tobacco was destroyed by hail entailing a loss of $25,000, has shown a most generous spirit in dealing with his tenants, who lost pretty much all they had in the destruction caused by the storm. Mr. Parrish had advanced them sums aggregating nearly $5,000 on the prospects of this year's tobacco, and since the storm he has released everyone of them from any and all obligations to him.

The farmers in this community have certainly been "up against it" this summer. Along with the wheat harvest rains began and occurred every day thus interfering greatly with this work. When they were ready to thresh rains also interfered, being of daily occurrence. Then there was the scarcity of labor which added to the wet weather made threshing a mere matter of chance. Many a crop was threshed out too wet, thus causing the wheat to bring a low price. In the midst of all this trouble along came the most destructive hailstorm that ever visited this county and ruined the tobacco and did great damage to the corn and gardens. During all this time the weeds have grown with an unparalled rapidity almost choking out the crops. Taking it all in all the farmers around here have had lots to discourage them since the first of July.—Scott County Democrat.

Personal Mention.

Mrs. May Bullinger, of Harrison county, is the guest of Mrs. C. C. Hughes.

Mrs. W. L. Riddell left yesterday for a visit with her brother at Detroit, Michigan.

Mrs. H. W. Blyth and little daughter, Louise, of Aurora, are guests of Mrs. Dudley Rouse.

Mrs. Laura Martin returned to Lakeland yesterday after a visit of a few days at home.

Misses Geneva and Lon Akins, of Woolper, were pleasant guests of Miss Arlie Sullivan Tuesday.

Miss Julia Garnett, of Hebron, was the pleasant guest of Miss Nellie Kirkpatrick, a couple of days last week.

Miss Nellie Martin is at home after a three months' period of substituting for her sister, Miss Birdie, who has a position at Lakeland.

At the colt show of O. P. and Albert Conner, last Monday, the premiums were awarded as follows: W. C. Goodridge first; Will Rice second; Gideon Kite third.

The Boones took two well played games from the strong Ft. Thomas team here last Monday. Brady pitched the game before noon, and had the visitors on the guess all the time. The boys went into win and win they did. Luck's rnuing catch retiring the side with two men on bases, was the feature of the morning game. Following is the score by innings:

Ft. Thomas	0	0	0	0	1	0	0	1	1	—3

Hits off Brady, 10, off Howe, 8; struck out by Brady, 8; by Howe, 5.

The game in the afternoon was the greatest exhibition of ball playing ever witnessed on the local grounds. Conner was in the box for the Boones and covered himself all over with glory, showing at critical points that he is complete master of the twirling art. Walton at third and Slayback at first played a remarkable game, while Luck was there with his stick again. Dr. Ross, at short, put up a sensational game for the visitors, while their right fielder was a little short of a wonder. It took thirteen innings to settle the contest. Here is the score by innings:

Hits—Boones 11; Ft. Thomas 4.

Struck out—By Conner 23; by Chevaliller 6.

NOTES.

Saturday was the banner day.

The men of finance were not so noisy as usual.

The display in Floral Hall was good every day.

The Association will hold its annual election this afternoon.

The music this year was far better than that of any of the past years.

The crowd each day was composed of nice looking, well behaved people.

P. G. Cropper, of Louisville, was present several days, greeting old friends.

The attendance for the four days was a little short of the four days last year.

The Falmouth fair had several boomers on hand two or three days, and they did their work well.

In its ten years' existence the fair has not struck a rainy day. It has stood in with the weather clerk, apparently.

The citizens of Florence used a sprinkler freely along Pike street consequently they were not annoyed with any dust.

The show of saddle horses was not so good as that of last year, while the show of beef cattle was the best in the history of the fair.

Pearl, little daughter, of James L. Clore, was particularly fortunate in finding money on the grounds. Her two finds amounted to $25.

Edwin M. Gaines, of Chicago, was mixing with the crowd on Friday and Saturday. His old friends were glad to take him by the hand once more.

Felix Gaines, of Brooklyn, New York, attended the fair on Friday and Saturday, and met many of his friends. Felix is looking fine as a fiddle.

Geo. Brown, of Nashville, Tenn., came up and spent several days at the fair meeting Boone county friends. George looks hearty and handsome.

Milton Goodridge, of Oldham county, killed two birds with one stone again last week. He visited his brothers at Florence and attended the fair.

The weight of C. E. Tanner's big Chesterwhite was guessed at from 800 to 1,400. It was by several hundpounds the largest hog ever on the fair ground.

Prof. A. C. Collins, of Covington, was on hand Friday, and was busy making his friend, A. M. Cassidy, of Lexington, acquainted with Boone county people.

Friday was Gus Menninger day, and his booth was a mecca for all. He dispensed fried chicken, ice cream and many other palateable articles to the delight of hundreds.

When N. E. Riddell, who acted as treasurer for Arthur Rouse, left the fair ground last Saturday evening, he had paid off all the premiums except one small one.

This is the Chinese interest in the road and for it China must be remunerated.

BLOODY WAR ENDED.

The Terms of Peace Settled by the Plenipotentiaries.

The Happy Conclusion of the Conference Was Sudden and Dramatic—In the Interest of Peace the Japanese Yielded.

Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 30.—The long and bloody war between Japan and Russia is ended. The terms of peace were settled by Mr. Witte and Baron Komura at the session of the conference Tuesday morning, and in the afternoon preliminary arrangements for an armistice were concluded and the actual work of framing the "treaty of Portsmouth" was by mutual agreement turned over to Mr. De Martens, Russia's great international lawyer, and Mr. Dennison, who for 25 years has acted as the legal adviser of the Japanese foreign office.

The treaty is expected to be completed by the end of the week.

This happy conclusion of the conference, which a week ago would have been shipwrecked had it not been for the heroic intercession of President Roosevelt, was sudden and dramatic. For the sake of peace Japan, with the magnanimity of a victor, at the last moment yielded everything still in issue. Russia refused to budge from the ultimatum Emperor Nicholas had given to President Roosevelt through Ambassador Meyer. No indemnity under any guise, but an agreement to divide Sakhalin and reimburse Japan for the maintenance of the Russian prisoners were his last words. They had been repeatedly reiterated in Mr. Witte's instructions and in the form of a written reply to the Japanese compromise proposal of last Wednesday they were delivered to Baron Komura Tuesday morning.

Mr. Witte went to the conference declaring he was powerless to change the dot of an i, or the cross of a t in his instructions. Emperor Nicholas' word had been given not only to him but to President Roosevelt, the head of a foreign state.

When Baron Komura, therefore, first offered the new basis of compromise outlined in the dispatches Monday (the complete renunciation of indemnity, coupled with a proposition for the redemption of Sakhalin at a price to be fixed by a mixed tribunal consisting of representatives of the neutral powers, in fact if not in words, the solution offered by the president) Mr. Witte again returned a non-possimus. It was what Mr. Witte termed in an interview the "Psychological moment." Mr. Witte did not flinch. He expected a rupture and as he expressed it afterward, he was stunned by what happened. Baron Komura gave way on all the disputed points. With the prescience that has enabled the Japanese to guage the mental processes of their adversaries on the field of battle and upon the sea, they had realized in advance that peace could be consulted in no other way. They had warned their governement. President Roosevelt had also, it is believed, advised Japan it was better to meet the Russian position than to take the responsibility of continuing the war for the purpose of collecting tribute. The mikado at the session of the cabinet and elder statesmen Monday had sanctioned the final concession. When Baron Komura yielded the rest was mere child's play.

Articles 10 and 11, (Interned warships and the limitation of Russia's sea power in the far East) were withdrawn. Japan agreed that only that portion of the Chinese Eastern railroad south of Chantfu, the position occupied by Oyama, should be ceded to Japan. Both sides, once the deadlock was broken, wanted a "Just and lasting" peace.

Before leaving the conference building felicitations were exchanged with the president at Oyster Bay. Both Baron Komura and Mr. Witte telegraphed. The former confined himself to apprising Mr. Roosevelt of the conditions upon which peace had been concluded. Mr. Witte frankly laid his tribute at the president's feet. In his message he said:

"History will ascribe to you the glory," and added the expression of Russia's hearty appreciation of the president's "generous initiative." Mr. Roosevelt replied with words of thanks and congratulations.

CONGRATULATORY MESSAGES.

They Poured in Upon the President From America and Europe.

Oyster Bay, Aug. 30.—Throughout the late afternoon and evening Tuesday messages of congratulation poured in on the president from people both in America and Europe. The great part he has played in the bringing about of the success of the conference and in promoting the interests of civilization is recognized throughout the world as is indicated by the cordiality and wide range covered by the congratulatory dispatches. None of these messages was made public.

What Berlin Thinks.

Will Make Loans.

INVENTIVE INGENUITY.

A Pittsburg man has invented a machine that will make and bake 40 pies a minute.

Among the latest inventions patented is a contrivance which, fitted to an ordinary sewing machine, will fan and massage the operator while she is working.

An Italian engineer has invented a successful elevator for raising sunken vessels. It consists of compressed air chambers of canvas and wire, each equal to a lifting capacity of 60 tons, and it is possible to attach as many of these as may be necessary.

Silicon, the most abundant metal in the world, but hitherto little known because of the difficulty of separating it from oxygen, has now been made obtainable in quantities to meet any demand by the electric furnace. It gives to steel valuable electrical properties, and is expected to assume importance in iron alloys.

Greater contrast in photographs is claimed for a new single lens, which causes the picture to stand out in relief as under the two lenses of a stereoscope. The lense is convex-concave, so that the axes of the rays from different parts of the picture meet in the eye, and the focal length should equal that of the camera taking the photograph.

A novel method of getting rid of black smoke and at the same time turning it to use is adopted in some Belgian factories. The smoke is driven by fans into a porous receptacle, over which flows a stream of petroleum or similar liquid. The smoke is thus caught and turned into gas that gives great heat, and can be used for running gas engines.

A poor laboring man in Denmark has made a new invention in life-saving. He impregnates clothes with a substance which will keep a shipwrecked person afloat for several days without losing its property. A coat, a vest, a traveling rug—in fact, any piece of wearing apparel impregnated with the stuff is enough to keep anyone above water. The invention has been successfully demonstrated.

MEDICAL MENTION.

Bright red spectacles, accompanied by internal doses of calomel, form a new German specific agent against seasickness.

According to Prof. Behring, "the milk fed to infants is the chief cause of consumption." He would insist on the pasteurization of all milk.

Remarkably favorable results are said to have followed the hypodermic injection of sea water in 24 tuberculosis patients by Dr. Fournol at a Paris hospital.

Perhaps it is not wise to prophesy a time when enzymic diseases shall lose all their terror by reason of the discovery of effective antidotes to the poisons to which their ravages are generally due—it is reasonable, however, to look forward to the time when the terror of these diseases, namely, diphtheria, typhoid fever, typhus and kindred scourges, shall be reduced to a minimum.

An English physician declares that it is better to keep scarlet fever patients at home, where the germs die out gradually in the fresh air, than to send them to a hospital, where they are in the midst of dozens of other cases in all stages of the disease. On their return to school, the germs are called into activity by the foul air in the room, and the disease is spread to others by coughing, etc.

Dr. G. C. Franklin, the new president of the British Medical association, in an address to the association at Leicester, pointed out the danger of overspecialization in medicine. The development of the specialist, he said, was inevitable, and he feared might tend to produce a narrower type of medical man, but on the whole the development had so far been beneficial both for the public and the profession.

The Woman Again.

He (after a long argument).—Well, anyhow, you can't deny that my taste is better than yours.

She (sweetly).—That was proved, I think, when we married, my dear.

STRONGER THAN MEAT.

A Judge's Opinion of Grape-Nuts.

A gentleman who has acquired a judicial turn of mind from experience on the bench out in the Sunflower State, writes a carefully considered opinion as to the value of Grape-Nuts as food. He says:

"For he past 5 years Grape-Nuts has been a prominent feature in our bill of fare.

"The crisp food with the delicious, nutty flavor has become an indispensable necessity in my family's everyday life.

"It has proved to be most healthful and beneficial, and has enabled us to practically abolish pastry and pies from our table, for the children prefer Grape-Nuts and do not crave rich and unwholesome food.

"Grape-Nuts keeps us all in perfect physical condition—as a preventive of disease it is beyond value. I have been particularly impressed by the beneficial effects of Grape-Nuts when used by ladies who are troubled with face blemishes, skin eruptions, etc. It clears up the complexion wonderfully.

"As to its nutritive qualities, my experience is that one small dish of Grape-Nuts is superior to a pound of meat for breakfast, which is an important consideration for anyone. It satisfies the appetite and strengthens the power of resisting fatigue, while its use involves none of the disagreeable consequences that sometimes follow a meat breakfast." A LESSON IN MANUAL TRAINING

PRACTICAL POINTS FOR BOYS WITH AMBITION AND GENIUS.

The More Perfect the Polish on the Surface of an Article the More Plainly Are Defects Shown—Patient Practice Needed to Insure Satisfactory Work in Making Joints—Different Kinds of Joints and How to Make Them.

BY JAMES RITCHEY.
(Instructor in Woodworking and Pattern-making, Armour Institute of Technology, Chicago.)
(Copyright, 1906, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

As may be seen from the few examples we have given in making different articles out of wood, a great deal of skill is required in using the tools so as to produce work in which the joints will be firm and close-fitting and all surfaces true and smooth.

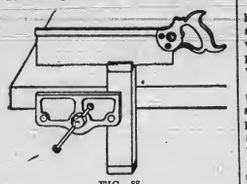

FIG. 88.

Nearly all beginners think that when the grain is slightly torn out or the surface is a little rough and uneven the filler and the varnish will cover up and hide all defects, correct all disfigurements of the wood and make everything perfect. All experience has proved that this is a very great mistake, as the filler and varnish or wax bring out and magnify the slightest defects, so that the more perfect the polish and finish put on the surface of any article the more pronounced will be every defect which has been allowed to remain in any of its surfaces, joints or other connections.

For this reason all the pieces which go to make up any article must, after planing, be scraped until all defects disappear, then thoroughly sandpaper, first with medium and lastly with very fine sandpaper.

In the matter of joints, such as mortises and tenons or other connections for the several parts of an article, only long-continued and patient practice will enable anyone to do satisfactory work, and we wish now to take up the subject of joints of different kinds, some of which have been needed in the construction of work already described.

As a means for teaching the worker to cut his shoulders for his tenons true and close to the line, there is nothing which will help him to acquire skill so rapidly as the exercise and directions given in connection with Fig. 24. Read over and over again the instructions there given, and continue to use the back saw on that or a similar exercise, until the shoulders of any tenons can be sawed true and close to the knife line. Under no circumstances saw just a little way from the line with the intention of trimming up to the line with a chisel. Satisfactory work cannot be done in this way. Compel the saw to cut a perfect shoulder for the tenon, and if it will not do so, be assured that the fault is not in the saw, but because of the lack of sufficient practice in its use by the operator.

After the shoulders of a tenon have been cut, if the tenon is short, say ½ to 1 inch in length, the piece is placed in the bench vise, as shown in Fig. 88, and the sides of the tenon are sawed down to the shoulders, always sawing in the waste wood, but close to the line, the same as when sawing the shoulder. It will be necessary to use for this purpose a back saw, having teeth filed to cut with the grain, the shape of the teeth being the same is in a rip hand saw. Such work always makes it necessary to have two back saws, one filed to cross cut and another to rip. When the piece is held in the above position, only the lines on the top end and on the edge toward the operator can be seen while sawing, and for this reason it is customary, especially when the tenons are long, to tilt the piece in the vise, as shown in Fig. 89, in which position the same lines will be seen and the saw kerf is made in a triangular manner as shown, until the shoulder is reached, when the wood is reversed and the same process repeated. Then place the piece vertically and complete the whole cut.

In carpentry, when the mortise and tenon extend through and through the side piece of a frame it is the usual practice, for the purpose of securing greater firmness and strength, to wedge the tenons as shown at A in Fig. 90. The wedges spread the tenon, making it slightly wider at the end than at the shoulder, as illustrated at B, compressing the fibers of the wood and forcing the edges of the tenon against the ends of the mortise. To prepare the tenon for the wedges, two thin saw kerfs are made with a back saw about one-third way down its length, as shown at C. The points of the wedges should be dipped in glue before driving, when they will each become a part of the tenon and add greatly to the strength of the framing.

Avoid the mistake so often made, especially in books of instruction in carpentry, of placing the wedges between the edges of the tenon and the ends of the mortise, as shown at D in Fig. 91. In this position the wedge lessens the strength of the frame, the tendency being to compress and to make the tenon tapering—narrower at the end than at the shoulder, as shown at E—and to drive it out of instead of drawing and holding it in the mortise as at A in Fig. 90.

practice in sawing. The wood for A should be about 2 inches wide and ¾ or ⅞ inch in thickness. Lay out all cross lines of the joint with a knife and try square, and use the mortise gauge for the lines which run lengthwise of the grain and across the ends. Saw the sides of the mortise from the end downward and cut out the piece between the saw kerfs as a whole piece, with a narrow chisel and mallet—taking care that all saw kerfs are made in the waste wood and close to the gauge lines. For the joint B the wood should be 2 inches wide and 1½ or 1¾ inches in thickness. The thickness of the tenon should be one-fourth of the thickness of the wood, and for A one-fourth of the width of the piece.

FIG. 95.

These joints should each be made of pine or poplar, and repeated until a good fit can be made by using the saw and, if possible, without trimming and fitting with a chisel.

The "half lap" joint shown in Figs. 93 and 94 is much used in carpentry where two pieces must cross each other in the same plane, as in the corners of a frame where all ends project in the manner shown in Fig. 95, or the diagonal stretchers of a table. They afford excellent practice for the combined use of the saw and chisel. They differ only in that the one shown in Fig. 93 is joined on flat, while Fig. 94 is on edge. As an exercise for practice the wood for each should be 2 inches wide, and ⅞ to 1¼ inches in thickness. Like A and B, Fig. 92, all lines must be made with a sharp-pointed knife and the marking gauge.

Fig. 96 is but another form of the half-lap joint, much used, and introduced here for practice, and to illustrate this form of construction. The wood when used for practice should be 2 inches wide and 1 or 1¼ inches in thickness.

LAND OF THE GUILLEMOTS.

Cliff-Homes of the Birds Where Egg-Gatherers Pursue Dangerous Calling.

Immense and lonely, like the battlemented walls of a forgotten city of giants, Flamborough's white cliffs towered high and sheepy and indifferent above the restless sea which lapped their hases and broke in creamy foam on the submerged rock fragments at their feet. Strangely like are those cliffs to the work of man—towers and bastions and barbicans great flanking walls of solid white masonry, 500 courses high; here and there narrow Gothic arches, flying buttresses and all the intricate stonework of an old cathedral. Who laid those beds of huge stone with the regular mortar-like interspaces?

"It was all deposited as a sea-bottom," says my geological companion, as we scramble along the grassy top with a perpetual quiver of fright at the tremendous depths beneath, relates a London writer.

But if so, how comes it that those thin horizontal layers of darker color are so regularly spaced? Did the sea hold a sort of centenary carnival, and deposit gravel instead of chalk for a few months at the end of every hundred years?

These lonely rocks are not really lonely. They are the cities of the guillemot, and every ledge and nook and recess in their steep battlements is crowded with those quaint clumsy birds. Down on the green water below guillemots are sprinkled thickly as though by a pepper box, squawking and disputing and chattering with a terrible din. On the ledges they stand in their white-breasted thousands, surveying the great flat sea like the Arab in his snowy burnoose looking out over the desert. And on little patches of grass are their green and tawny eggs, bigger than a hen's, and pointed at one end like a peg-top so that they shall not roll off.

And now we have a thrilling sight. For one of the egg gatherers is going to descend. Tall, browny, hearded, with big helmet to save his head from loosened stones, he is let down at the end of a rope, and walks backwards down the rough perpendicular cliff. At each step he bounces himself away from the rock, sometimes ten yards or so, and yet he always manages to swing back on the other foot. As he descends showers of birds fall off the cliff, for the guillemot turns a backward somersault into the air, when he wants to fly. It is a fearful sight to see that man swinging lower and lower till he gets no bigger than a bird, swinging to a ledge, picking up a few eggs, and putting them into the satchel on his back, and always managing to approach those jagged rocks feet foremost. At last he jerks the rope and begins to walk upward, bringing enough eggs to fill a large market basket. And after this desperate adventure one egg in five goes to the landowner for rent.

Baggage Easily Identified.

Some English tourists who are in the habit of traveling with a good many trunks have a way of marking their baggage for identification purposes which looks strange to American eyes. It is not at all unusual now to see landed on the steamship piers a big pile of trunks and bags, around each of which will be a stripe of some vivid color. A bright red stripe around a sole leather trunk may look queer, but its usefulness is apparent in the ease with which the baggage is picked out by the owner. An Englishman who came over recently had his trunks not only decorated with a white stripe, but on the top of each was his coat-of-arms in colors. His baggage was handled with much dispatch.—N. Y. Sun.

It Depends.

De Peyster (they have been conversing on art topics)—Are you fond of majolica, Mrs. Parvenue?

Mrs. Parvenue (who has made several bad mistakes since her entrance into society, and is on her guard)—Well—er—that depends entirely on how it is cooked.—Chicago Journal.

ARMISTICE IS SIGNED.

Does Into Effect After the Signatures To the Peace Treaty.

Portsmouth, N. H., Sept. 2.—An armistice was signed Friday. Technically the general cessation of hostilities will be an "armistice," inasmuch as it is temporary, pending the final exchange of ratifications. It does not provide for the ultimate release of the Russian and Japanese prisoners of war. An article covering the latter subject will be included in the treaty. The delay in cessation of hostilities was due to refusal of Japan to consent to earlier time.

The effect of the armistice concluded Friday is that it becomes operative only upon the signature of the treaty by the plenipotentiaries and continues until the final exchange of ratification of the emperors of the two countries.

As a result of the reports made Friday night by Mr. De Martens and Mr. Dennison to their respective chiefs upon their work at the navy yard in the drafting of a treaty of peace Mr. Witte and Baron Komura had a brief conference in the former's apartments at 8:30 regarding some details of translation and the few points of interpretation upon which the framers had been unable to reach complete accord. When Baron Komura left Mr. Dennison and Mr. Adachi, he entered the apartments of Mr. Witte, where they were joined by Mr. De Martens and Mr. Plancon. This conference lasted for about half an hour when the Japanese returned to Baron Komura's apartments, leaving Mr. Witte and his conferees who remained in conference for more than an hour. Mr. Witte and Baron Kumora had no difficulty in coming to an agreement on the disputed points.

CHOLERA SPREADING.

Forty-Three Cases of the Disease Reported in Prussia.

Berlin, Sept. 2.—Forty-three cases of cholera in all have been reported. Nine persons have died from the disease and many suspicious cases are under observation. The legal and medical machinery for dealing with this invasion of the Asiatic bacillus is now working at full pressure.

Prof. Edward Sonnenburg said that no one need fear an epidemic such as that of 1892-93 because the health authorities since that time had built up an organization quite adequate to grasp the beginnings of cholera and to put down the disease with precision and firmness.

New York, Sept. 2.—That extra precautions shall be taken to prevent bringing in a case of cholera among immigrants from German ports was agreed at a conference between Health Officer A. H. Doty, of this port, and the representatives of several transAtlantic steamship companies. The plan is said to exercise great care in taking the immigrants on board ship in German ports. The discovery of a case of cholera in Hamburg was the cause of the conference. Dr. Doty said after the conference that he had no reason to think that cholera would get to New York, considering all the precautions being taken.

THE FEVER RECORD.

Bears Out the Hopeful View of Dr. White That the Worst Is Over.

New Orleans, Sept. 2.—Record up to 6 p. m. Friday: Deaths, 4; new cases, 39; new foci, 10; total deaths, 281; total cases, 1,958.

New Orleans, Sept. 2.—The fever record Friday bore out the hopeful view of Dr. White and his fellow fever-fighters that the worst is over and that if the citizens of New Orleans are watchful and continue to give the authorities the same co-operation they have in the past few weeks the miracle will be wrought of stamping out the fever before frost comes to lay low the last of the fugitive stegomyia. Contrary to all expectations the fever is assuming a milder form at the period when it was expected to grow most deadly and the deaths have grown insignificant in number. That is true not only of New Orleans but at the various points in Mississippi where the disease has appeared. In that state there have been about 70 cases to date and only one death.

Must Appear in Court.

Chicago, Sept. 2.—Officers, employes and lawyers of the large packing industries who were indicted by the last federal grand jury on charges of conspiracy and violation of federal anti-trust interstate commerce laws, have been ordered to appear in the United States district court before Judge Humphrey, of Springfield, on next Tuesday, September 5, and enter their pleas of guilty or not guilty to the charges.

Week's Business Failures.

New York, Sept. 2.—Business failures in the United States for the week ending August 31 number 161, against 176 last week, 189 in the like week of 1904, 162 in 1903, 133 in 1902 and 169 in 1901.

M. Witte's Daughter Robbed.

Brussels, Sept. 2.—Mme. Narychkine, wife of Cyril M. Narychkine, secretary of the Russian legation here, and daughter of Mr. Witte, the Russian peace plenipotentiary, while leaving the theater missed a pearl necklace valued at $9,000.

Envoys Invited To St. Louis.

St. Louis, Sept. 2.—Two telegrams, identical in all respects, were sent by the merchants exchange to the Japanese and Russian peace envoys at Portsmouth, asking the envoys and their suites to visit St. Louis.

INTERESTING STATE NEWS

THEY FAILED.

In the Dark Artillery Made An Attack on Camp Yeiser.

Paducah, Ky., Aug. 30.—There was an artillery attack on "Camp Yeiser" Tuesday morning about 1 o'clock from a road to the south. The troops responded promptly to the riot call and put out skirmish lines to capture the artillery, but it escaped by an unexpected route. The men in charge of the cannon lost the breech and two men run the lines of defense, stole a lantern and were making for the road when captured. The defensive formation was complete, the camp being protected on all sides. Tuesday night the soldiers took in the sights, as this was pay day. The pay roll amounted to $3,722.70. Col. Ayres paid off in 43 minutes, which was three minutes over his record made in paying the First. At the next legislature it is probable that a bill will be introduced increasing the pay of the privates to $1.25 a day and 50 cents extra for drills. At present they get 43 cents a day from the government and nothing for drills. Some of the high officials are discussing a proposition to make Paducah the permanent location for the state encampments on account of its natural advantages.

ALLEGED CONFESSION.

A Forgery of Notes Amounting to $6,300 on a Louisville Bank.

Louisville, Ky., Sept. 1.—John H. Waters, formerly the head of a private savings bank at Sellersburg, Ind., wanted here on the charge of forgery, came to Louisville and, it is alleged, confessed that he had forged notes held by the First National bank of this city to the extent of $6,300. The alleged confession was made, it is said, in the presence of Clint C. McCarty, the president of the bank, and Burdette C. Lutz, of Jeffersonville, the assistant prosecuting attorney from Clary county, Indiana. Waters, it is claimed, said that he had been renewing the notes for four years, and that they originally represented $8,000.

SUCCEEDS POYNTZ.

R. G. Phillips Is Chosen Secretary By the State Election Commission.

Frankfort, Ky., Sept. 1.—The state election commission elected R. G. Phillips, of Hardin county as secretary, to succeed Ollie M. Poyntz. J. L. Ferguson was appointed democratic commissioner in Hopkins county, and A. C. Carden in Hart county. On motion of Commissioner Burnam, republican, a change was made in Garrard county by substituting H. H. Batson for Calvin Neview as a republican commissioner. The board will meet again September 8 to select the democratic commissioners in Bath, Daviess, Magoffin, Marshall, Whitley and Union counties.

TO EXPEDITE POWERS' TRIAL.

The Transfer of the Hearing To the United States Court Is Opposed.

Frankfort, Ky., Aug. 30.—The record and briefs of the commonwealth in appeal from a ruling of United States District Judge Cochran, assuming jurisdiction of the case of Caleb Powers, were forwarded to the clerk of the supreme court at Washington. States Attorney General Hays will appear before that court October 9 and ask a speedy hearing and that a writ of mandamus issue to require the return of the case to the Kentucky courts.

Paris, Ky., Aug. 31.—One of the largest sales of farming lands ever made in Harrison county was consummated when Judge W. T. Lafferty, of Cynthiana, sold for the estate of S. J. Ashbrook, 575 acres for a little over $43,000, an average of $75 per acre.

ROW ON A TRAIN.

Alfred Ray Instantly Killed and Wm. Blain Fatally Shot.

Louisville, Ky., Aug. 31.—Alfred Ray was instantly killed and William Blain was fatally shot during a row on north-bound train No. 24 of the Louisville & Nashville railroad. The shooting occurred as the train was nearing Stephenson, Ky., at which place the two victims lived. John Huebank, the negro porter on the train, is in jail at Hardinsburg charged with murder, and a colored woman is held as a witness and possible participant in the affray. According to the statement of the trainmen Ray and Blain with a number of friends boarded the train at Hallsville. All had been drinking and became involved in trouble with the conductor over the payment of fares. Later, as the negro Huebank entered the coach set apart for negroes, where the white men had established themselves, it is alleged that Ray and Blain and the others violently abused him and a negro woman passenger. The shooting followed, but the conductor of the train was unable to state whether the porter or the negro woman or both used revolvers.

BOONE COUNTY RECORDER.

VOL. XXX. BURLINGTON, KENTUCKY, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1905. NO. 48.

County Correspondence.

BULLITTSVILLE.

Jas. Clore and wife and Mrs. Morris, of Rushville, Indiana, visited at Fletcher Clore's during the fair.

Everybody who sees Ben Jones' crop of tobacco say it is the finest they ever saw. The writer believes he can truthfully say that there is not another five acre crop in the county that will equal it.

o o o

BELLEVIEW.

Sept. 11.—Quite a lot of tobacco is standing out.

Mrs. Nora Huey, of Rising Sun, was calling on friends here last Saturday.

Ezra Aylor, of near Burlington, was calling on his cousin, S. D. Rice, Sunday.

Elbert Clore helped Lewis Clore, of Clores' Ridge to cut and house his tobacco last week.

Charlie Wilson and family moved into Mrs. Caroline McMullen's house in McVille, this week.

Horace Hewitt and wife, of Aurora, were guests of Mrs. Hewitt's mother, several days the past week.

Robert Bradford's two daughters, of near Meares Hill, Indiana, are visiting relatives here this week.

Will and Bernard Rogers and wives were visiting the parents of their wives near Commissary, last Sunday.

James Setters finished threshing grain here last Friday and run his machine into shelter to await another crop.

Mrs. Unie Cox, after several weeks' stay with relatives here, returned to her home in Nashville, Tenn., one day last week.

James Rogers sent a nice bunch of beef cattle through to the city by land last week. Jim always has something to turn into money on his farm.

The festival at the I. O. O. F. Hall, last Saturday night, for the benefit of the Christian church, was well attended. The proceeds amounted to nearly $40.

James Riley, after a couple years' or more stay in California, returned home one day last week to see his family and parents. It is reported he will return to California this fall, probably taking his wife and daughter with him

We were sorry to learn that Bro. W. Douglas Darnell, who preached for the Christian church here a couple of years ago, has gone to western Texas. The best wishes of this church accompany him and his wife to their new field of work.

The cakes sold at the festival last Saturday night brought from 35 cents to $1 each. The proceeds went into the church funds, and we extend our thanks to all for their aid and patronage, and especially for the excellent order shown us.

For Sale—A 10 year old mare with young mule by her side. Can be seen at Mr. Lambert's, near Loonst Grove school house; also another aged mare, which can be seen at my residence in Bellaview. ELIJA RIDDELL.

These two young people are first cousins and of the same age, and have just passed their sixteenth birth days. Both are very popular in Petersburg.

Miss Zarilda proved herself a very charming young hostess. She was untiring in her efforts to make her young friends enjoy themselves, and she succeeded so admirably that everyone went home singing her praises and congratulating themselves that they were permitted to be present.

No social sand-bars were encountered that evening. There was a continual round of pleasure from the time the guests arrived until they departed for their homes in the wee sma' hours of the morning.

About 11 o'clock a fish pond was improvised by stretching a canvass across one end of the hall, and behind which sat Mr. Shattuc with a collection of souvenirs consisting of small toys. Each souvenir was numbered. The ladies were first invited to fish for a partner to supper. Then the gentlemen, after which they compared their catch, and those who held corresponding numbers were partners to a most inviting and appetizing lunch consisting of icecream, cakes and a delightful fruit punch.

The pleasures of the evening were concluded with a string-chewing contest. Each guest was provided with a string about three feet long with a gum drop attached to one end. Prizes were offered to the first two who succeded without the assistance of the hand or tongue in chewing the string until they got the gum-drops in their mouths. o o o

HEBRON.

Last Sunday afternoon Ed Ernestc and John Kelsey, of this place, and Robt. Kelly, of West Covington, who has been boarding here with Mrs. Ernestc for several weeks, started to the Cincinnati ball park. Owing to the rain that afternoon they got no farther than Anderson Ferry, where they imbibed too freely, and as they were coming down to the ferry to return to this side of the river, Kelsey and Kelly got into a quarrel that lead up to an altercation in which Kelly used a knife on Kelsey, cutting an ugly gash on the left side of the neck, and another in his left side, severing one of the lower ribs. Ernestc managed to get Kelsey across the river and up to Klassemer's stable, where his wounds were washed, when he was put in a buggy and sent right home. It is believed that Kelsey's wounds will prove fatal. Kelly did not return to Hebron until Monday morning, when he claimed that he had no knowledge whatever of the cutting. Ernestc does not know what the man fell out about. Kelsey is a widower, 40 years old, and a painter by occupation. None of his people live here. Kelly is a single man, about 30 years of age. Owing to the condition of the men at the time the cutting was done, it is difficult to get a straight account of the deplorable affair.

Since the above was written we hear that Ernste says he does not know by whom nor when Kelsey was cut; that he did not see a knife in the hands of either him or Kelly when they were fighting, and that he did not know that Kelsy was cut anywhere except on the neck until after they arrived at Klassenr's on this side of the river.

[A couple of Ohio officers came out yesterday to have Kelly arrested but someone tipped them off and he lit out.—ED.]

THE ROMANCE OF A POLE-HUNTER

The Long Wooing of Anthony Fiala Is Soon to End.

BACK FROM THE NORTH TO CLAIM A BRIDE

Wooed for Eight Years, a Pretty Southern Maid Will Wed an Ardent Lover—Her Word Given as He Sailed Northward Two Years Ago.

Nashville, Tenn.—Some time during the coming winter there will be solemnized in this city a marriage that will mark the climax to one of the prettiest romances this land of romances has known in many a year.

It will be a union of the north and south — of that north represented by the frozen ice fields surrounding the north pole, and of this sunny southland.

Anthony Fiala, the hero of the Ziegler expedition in search of the pole, is the hero of this romance, and Miss Claire Puryear, a young lady prominent in Nashville society, is the heroine, and the story of their courtship is an interesting one.

It has been a long engagement, even as long engagements go, and even a longer wooing, says a special writer to the New York World. It was eight years ago that Anthony Fiala, then a youngster of 27, first met Miss Puryear. He was a member of gallant troop C, of Brooklyn, then. He had gone as part of the escort of the governor of New York to the exposition at Nashville. On New York day, just by chance, he was introduced to Miss Puryear, a guest at the governor's reception.

Of course the trooper did just what he ought to have done—he fell in love with her. They corresponded after he left Nashville for good, but that was all. Chance took young Fiala back again to Tennessee and he made bold to say what his heart had bidden him.

"No," said the young girl, thinking, of course, it was final.

But men who are fit to brave the terrors of the arctic don't give up at one rebuff, and a hundred times more not so Anthony Fiala. He went away undaunted. Again and again he begged the girl to marry him, sometimes going to Tennessee just to make one more proposal; at other times sending his message by letter.

Then in seeming despair he gave it up.

"I am going after the pole," he wrote in 1901, and it wasn't a joke, either. William Zeigler was then fitting out his second expedition in 1903, he selected young Fiala, then but 33 years old.

"Northward, always northward," was Mr. Ziegler's injunction, as he intrusted the young man to the command of the America, the best ship that ever ground her way through Arctic ice.

Fiala promised.

He sailed from New York in May with fifty members of his party. The other officers with him were: R. R. Tafel, of Philadelphia; Charles L. Seitz, of Evansville, Ind.; William J. Peters, of the geological survey, second in command; Francis Long, of the weather bureau, the meteorologist of the expedition; Dr. G. W. Shorkley, of Camden, Me.; J. Collin Vaugh, of Forest Hill, N. J.; Charles E. Rellits, of St. Louis; John Vedge, of Boston; Spencer W. Stuart, of Brooklyn, and H. H. Newcourt, of Milford, Mass.

When he sailed there was a little party of women to see him off—his mother, one or two relatives and the girl from Nashville. She had relented at last.

"When you come back," she whispered, as he started up the gangplank of the steamer that was to take him to Norway, "I will marry you."

"When I find the pole," answered Fiala, "I'll be back."

But nobody knew that either had promised the other. It was only when the brief dispatch came on August 11 that Miss Puryear told her secret—she was to marry the intrepid young arctic explorer when he could come back to her. Wooed six years and his promised sweetheart for two years more, she had kept her secret well. For two years lacking less than a month she had not heard a word from him. Her last letter was dated in September, 1903, when the gallant little band passed out of reach of the mails for almost 12 months.

The expedition cost $250,000. The party were taking everything possible for the prosecution of the search for the pole. Everything that science or comfort could suggest found a place aboard the sturdy ship. There were 210 Siberian dogs, 30 Siberian ponies, ten tons of horse food, 41 tons of dog food, 160 pounds of tobacco, 1,200 pounds of guncotton, 5,000 rounds of ammunition for rifles and shotguns, 63 sledges of special design, two specially built canoes 18 feet long, made to take apart in sections for transport on the sledges, tons of the most skilfully prepared concentrated food of all kinds, and so on without limit.

Fiala took 37 men with him, two of them Norwegians inured to Arctic cold. The America sailed from Tronsoe, Trondjhem, Norway, on June 29, 1903, for Franz Josef Land, where Fiala intended to spend the winter, dispatching thence dog sledges with small parties farther north. The last heard from him before the cables brought the news of his rescue the other day was in October, 1903, when a whaling vessel brought the news that the America had failed to make Franz Josef Land, but would try again the following spring.

Mr. Ziegler discredited the report. But in 1904 he sent his secretary, William S. Champ, from Trondjhem on the steamer Fritjof, but Champ returned without tidings. This year, just before he died, Mr. Zeigler sent two expeditions. One was commanded by Mr. Champ on the Terra Nova, the other by Dr. Oliver L. Fassig, of Johns Hopkins university, on the Belgica. On August 7 came a message from Shannon island, from Dr. Fassig, stating he had found no traces of Fiala. Four days later came word from Champ. He had found Fiala, and all were well. One of the Norwegians had died of natural causes, that was all.

It was a long weary wait for the girl.

It was not the wait of a girl who can reach her sweetheart by mail or telegraph. It was not the wait of a girl whose affianced might be on the other side of the globe and yet able to communicate with her. For two years she never knew whether he was alive or dead, whether he was achieving the glory of being the first to set foot on the spot that has been men's ambition for a century, or whether his bones were not whitening on some Arctic waste.

The first relief expedition started a year ago. She waited for its return. No news. A second went out and came back without finding a trace of the man she loved, or his ship. A third went northward nearly four months ago—she waited again.

And then—the glorious news, alive and well!

It came first in the regular dispatches from far away Norway, and then in another message to Fiala's brother, Louis—"Returned, good health, love from Anthony." A third dispatch went to Tennessee, but what was in it is not on record. It was then that Miss Puryear's secret became known to the world. She admitted that she would become the wife of this man who had twice risked his life in search of the frozen pole.

Up in Norway, meanwhile, the young man was receiving the congratulations of men who know what it means to brave the terrible rigors of two Arctic winters. Though he had lost his ship and had failed to reach the pole, or even the farthest north, he had come back with an honorable record—everybody knew that. Of the 38 men, all but one were safe, and sound. The dead man did not succumb to anything that he might not have died of in his own home. It was a record far surpassing that of the other Ziegler expedition.

Fiala spoke modestly of what had happened during these past two years, saying nothing for himself, though it was largely due to him that he had brought his men back all right.

Fiala didn't have much to say of what he had been through, but others told of it. The men were, in fairly good shape, but some were so weak that they never could have withstood a third winter in the Arctic.

It was the terrible winter of 1902 and 1904 that was against them. When storms and grinding ice crushed the stanch America like a pasteboard box, this ship that had weathered many an Arctic winter before, Fiala did not give up. He saved 50 tons of provisions and 100 tons of coal, which he deposited on the ice for further use. Then he led his men out on the ice fields. The last wreckage of their ship disappeared in the fearful storm of January 22, 1904. His ship gone, Fiala did not give up his search for the pole. Parties went out east, west and north, trying to force a passage north. There was impassable ice everywhere, and much open water, which forbade other attempts. Then the provisions began to fail. It meant a forced march south or death for everybody.

It was a long, painful and terrible journey on foot and sledge to the southward. Ultimately the party reached the caches at Cape Flora, Cape Dillon and Cape Ziegler. The men were distributed at these three places, and eked out the provisions they found by catching bear and walrus, on which they subsisted.

Everybody was hopeful until the autumn of 1904, when no relief ship came. The party knew it was useless to pass another winter in the Arctic without any hope of rescue. Food in the fields stretched in every direction, it was plain that no help could come until another season.

But at home there was one girl who had hope. And when spring came [illegible] one man who had made up his mind to obey to the letter the parting injunction of William Ziegler, even then doomed to death:

"Don't come back without Fiala. Bring him back dead or alive."

Mr. Champ knew what that meant, and he resolved to do it. While Fiala's men were fast losing hope, the Terra Nova was making her way northward almost by inches. She sailed from Tromsoe, Norway, on June 13 last. She encountered tremendously thick ice all the way. She encountered perils that would have driven back almost anyone save an American.

From Tromsoe she shaped her course direct for the ice fields, which she found on June 19. Then she slipped along eastward until June 27, when she began to drive her way through the floes. On July 25, four weeks later, the Terra Nova struck open water.

But this was only for a brief spell. On July 28 she again hit the ice. Champ had experienced navigators with him and they were agreed that they could never reach Fiala. Some even doubted that they could get back themselves until next year.

"Keep on," ordered Champ quietly, and the resolute men set their faces still to the north.

On July 28 they sighted Paimi Island. Next day, after a 24-hour battle, they reached the island. Then they knew they had won. There they found six members of the expedition which Fiala's foresight had left there. Then Champ knew that his mission was successful, for the six told him where headquarters were at Cape Dillon, and that Fiala and the rest of his men were alive and well there.

Out went the sledges.

They bore joyful news to Fiala—a rescue ship was waiting! Fiala told them where the rest of his party were at Cape Flora, and on July 30 these were found, too. Some of the men were mere skeletons, worn down by the hardships they had endured for two years, but no one was in such a bad way that good food and plenty of rest would not bring him around all right. On August 1 all the parties were gathered together and the start made for Norway, where everybody arrived safe and well on August 10. It took six days' hard work to get out of the ice-pack—the rest of the sail to Norway was easy. The sturdy ship that had rescued the men was unharmed.

Miss Puryear, the girl who has waited, has been teaching school in Tennessee for the past five years. She is strikingly handsome, talented and cultured. She moves in the best Nashville society. Maj. John Reid, of Virginia, is her grandfather; the family is well known throughout both Tennessee and Virginia.

Miss Puryear was too modest to say anything to a correspondent about her romance.

"We will be married in the winter," was all that she would vouchsafe.

How Crocodiles Are Caught.

In some parts of India the natives dig a crocodile pit which they cover with sticks and leaves. The pit surrounds a little island or a mound of earth and is close to a stream where crocodiles abound. On this mound they fasten a young goat, and its bleatings through the night attract the crocodiles who break the frail cover of sticks with their heavy bodies and fall into the pit prepared for them.

Alcohol Root of Many Diseases.

Prof. Stadelman, principal physician of the great hospital at Friedrichshain, a suburb of Berlin, in his latest report estimates that between one-quarter and one-third of the diseases afflicting men in the great districts in Berlin inhabited by workmen are caused by the improper use of alcohol.

THE PRINCE OF BUTLERS.

His Resourcefulness Saved His Mistress in an Awkward Situation.

The late Thomas Coldwell, the inventor of the lawn mower, was a great admirer of witty and alert persons.

At a dinner in New York Mr. Coldwell said of a famous millionaire:

"This man, through hard luck, once had to work as a butler. He made an excellent butler. Let me give you an instance of the sort of work he did.

"His mistress was giving a dinner party of 12 covers on a certain evening. One of the courses consisted of scalloped oysters in silver shells. The set of silver shells was broken—there were only 11. The mistress, therefore, told the butler that she would not eat any oysters, and thus there would be just enough to go around.

"The butler, when the oyster course came, placed before the lady one of the shells. To his horror, she did not decline it. Calmly she let it rest before her. If she started to eat it, one guest would be short of oysters. What was the matter with her, anyhow?

"The butler watched her nervously. She took up her fork. She was actually about to plunge it into the dainty shell. Then the man, ever alert and ready, flew to her side and bent over her respectfully.

"'Pardon me, madam,' he murmured, 'but you said I was to remind you that the doctor forbade your eating oysters on any account.'"

Cure to Stay Cured.

Wapello, Iowa, Sept. 11th, (Special)—One of the most remarkable cures ever recorded in Louisa County is that of Mrs. Minne Hart of this place. Mrs. Hart was in bed for eight months, and when she was able to sit up she was all drawn up on one side, and could not walk across the room. Dodd's Kidney Pills cured her. Speaking of her cure Mrs. Hart says:

"Yes, Dodd's Kidney Pills cured me after I was in bed for eight months, and I know the cure was complete, for that was three years ago, and I have not been down since. In four weeks from the time I started taking them I was able to make my garden. Nobody can know how thankful I am to be cured or how much I feel I owe to Dodd's Kidney Pills."

This case again points out how much the general health depends on the Kidneys. Cure the Kidneys with Dodd's Kidney Pills and nine-tenths of the suffering the human family is heir to will disappear.

In Temptation's Way.

"This is the first time you have been to prayer-meeting in a long time," said the pastor of a colored congregation.

"I had to come," replied Mr. Erastus Pinkley. "I needs strength'nin'. I'se got a job whitewashin' a chicken coop an' buildin' a fence around a watermelon patch."—Washington Star.

STOP, WOMAN!
AND CONSIDER THIS ALL-IMPORTANT FACT
That in addressing Mrs. Pinkham you are confiding your private ills to a woman—a woman whose experience with women's diseases covers a great many years.
You can talk freely to a woman when it is revolting to relate your private troubles to a man—besides a man does not understand—simply because he is a man.
Many women suffer in silence and drift along from bad to worse, knowing full well that they ought to have immediate assistance, but a natural modesty impels them to shrink from exposing themselves to the questions and probably examinations of even their family physician. It is unnecessary. Without money or price you can consult a woman who has knowledge from actual experience is great.
Mrs. Pinkham's Standing Invitation.
Women suffering from any form of female weakness are invited to promptly communicate with Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. All letters are received, opened, read and answered by women only. A woman can freely talk of her private illness to a woman; thus has been established the eternal confidence between Mrs. Pinkham and the women of America which has never been broken. Out of the vast volume of experience which she has to draw from, it is more than possible that she has gained the very knowledge that will help your case. She asks nothing in return except your good-will, and her advice has relieved thousands. Surely any woman, rich or poor, is very foolish if she does not take advantage of this generous offer of assistance.
If you are ill, don't hesitate to get a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound at once, and write Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., for special advice.
When a medicine has been successful in restoring to health so many women, you cannot [illegible] evidence.
I do not believe it will help me.

A FEW CUTTING REMARKS
The purpose of a saw is to cut. It should cut easily, cut cleanly, and cut with every movement.
I prefer an Atkins Saw. Its blade is "Silver Steel", recognized the world over as the finest crucible steel ever made in ancient or modern times. It is hard, close-grained and tough. It holds a sharp cutting edge longer than any other steel. Its blade tapers perfectly from thick to thin, from handle to tip. Thus it makes less try for itself, runs easily and does not buckle. Its temper is perfect. When bent by a crooked thrust, it springs into shape without kinking.
The Atkins Saw cuts—and does it best of any. We make all types and sizes of saws, but only one grade—the best.
Atkins Saws, Corn Knives, Pruning Floor Scrapers, etc., are sold by all good hardware dealers. Catalogue on request.

When you ask your druggist for Mull's Grape Tonic, a cure for Constipation, Stomach and Bowel Trouble, and he tries to sell you something else which he claims is just as good that is substitution or dishonesty. It is an insult to your intelligence. He does it for profit and not because he cares about your health. No honest druggist will do it.

BEES IN PORCH PILLAR.

Are Busily Storing Up Sweets for Winter, Which Alton (Ill.) Family Hopes to Enjoy.

A swarm of bees paid a visit to the residence of E. A. Clement, of No. 720 Grove street, Alton, Ill., last Sunday and immediately proceeded to take possession of the back part of the house. Mr. Clement's sweet tooth began to wat-, and he made preparations to hive the little visitors. The bees, however, had already selected their new quarters, and began moving through an aperture in the base of a hollow column on the veranda.

The entire swarm was soon inside and at work preparing to store up their next winter's supply of honey. "Oh, very well," said Mr. Clement, "why doth the busy bee, anyhow? Stay where you are, and next winter I will remove a section of the post and revel in the accumulated sweetness." And in the meantime visions of milk and honey flit through the peaceful dreams of the Clement household.

CARE OF MANES AND TAILS

Some Valuable Suggestions for the Improvement in Appearance of the Horse.

In response to an inquiry as to what to do to improve rough, uneven and unsightly manes and tails, a leading horse authority gives its readers the following suggestions:

"Cleanliness is the first thing to be looked after. If dirt is suffered to accumulate at the roots of the long hair the horse will rub and destroy it. Therefore, good, honest soap and water is a mighty aid to keep manes and tails looking well. A little sheep dipzeneleum is excellent, used periodically at the roots of the long hair will stimulate growth measurably and kill or repel vermin that may have found or seek a lodgment. When a horse is rubbing his tail, which he always is when anything is wrong, the first thing to be done is to discover the cause. Then apply plentifully soap and water and the solution described. One part of the dip in 50 parts of warm water is right as to strength. Then the mane and tail should be kept clean by the use of comb and brush and more or less frequent washing. The long hair should be dried as well as possible after each scouring, and when the dip solution is applied there is no need to slop it over so that it runs down or away from the skin where it is needed. It should be rubbed in briskly for a few moments. The mane and tail should be handled gently. It is very easy to tear out great quantities of the long hair with a common curry comb, and in that very way much damage is done. A curry comb should never be used on a mane or tail. Use the comb specially designed for the purpose. The tail should never be plaited to make it look crinkly. To plait it is to break off the hair and in time to spoil the looks of the tail."

GARDEN WORK.

Your work may be big without being great.

Put conscience into your work and see the original grew.

The fall is a good time to paint farm buildings, as the rain has by that time laid the dust.

If your wife cultivates the garden and raises vegetables for you to eat, do not begrudge her a plentiful supply of flower seeds.

Turnips should always be sown previous to rain, if possible. The success of this crop in a great measure depends upon quick germination, and a rapid, free growth the first few weeks.

The farmer who says one word or who does a single thing to make his neighbor a better farmer, has not lived in vain, though he may never put a dollar in the bank, or count his acres by the thousand.

Feeding the Hens.

See that they have protein or muscle-making material.

Too much corn and too little exercise makes fat, lazy hens.

Wheat teems with the elements that repair the waste to which laying hens are subject.

Remember that oats are excellent food for egg production, but should be fed with other grain.

Feed your laying hens on a mixed [illegible] balanced ration, for hens can [illegible] on one kind of grain.

Oct.

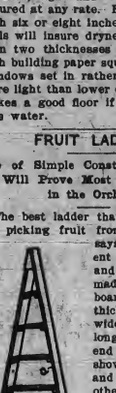
Thomas Hadley Was the Wedding Out at Six O'Clock and Scrubs Will Increase Trade.

I once heard a good horseman say that a man has no means of knowing the power and endurance there is in a team until he has, under good care, put a pair of hard muscle—the very utmost that horseflesh is capable of putting on. He said that it is possible to add 100 per cent to the strength and endurance of horses in this way. I was reminded of this when, after disposing of one third of my flock of hens, I find that I am getting about as many eggs from 50 as I did from 75. Of course, only the old hens and the "scrubs" were sold. The remainder are now helping themselves to some ripening grain and besides get a good mess of meal twice each day. They have squared up and brightened up remarkably.

An underfed horse lets his rigs grin at the owner and the owner can either do something to cover them up or bear the sight of them. If a hen's ribs could show through her feathers I fear they would be too often visible, says the Michigan Farmer. Other signs, just as plain as the ribs in a poor horse, indicate an underfed condition in the hens. Hens would keep easier afterward, if once put in good condition, and the feed then consumed would be used to a good purpose. I am therefore forced to the conclusion that too large flocks are kept on many farms.

If there are too many in the flock when running at large, and feed only is the deficient element, how about it next winter when both feed and room will have to be considered? I am inclined to think that crowded poultry houses and scant feeding have much to do with making hens a tax in winter instead of a source of income. With many it will be necessary to diminish the flock or enlarge the winter quarters before cold weather comes. Many will be disinclined to do any lessening of the flock for fear of lessening the egg product in the same ratio. This, however, is not apt to be the case. In fact the effect is apt to be the opposite.

Last winter I had 75 hens in a building 16x16 feet, and although I worked faithfully with them, they held back their eggs much longer than I wished, and much longer than they ought. In winters when only 60 hens were in the same building eggs came without so much labor on my part.



Whether the flock shall be diminished or the winter room increased, depends. If the flock consists of choice young hens the space for keeping them next winter should be increased, unless it is already adequate. If the flock contains a lot of old or "scrub" hens, these had better be sold pretty soon—before the market is crowded as it generally is every autumn.

No invariable rule can be given in answer to this question. One's ability, taste and good judgment must govern in the matter. Lumber that has served a purpose in a barn will be all right if put together with a good admixture of building paper or some other material to shut out the cold and wind. Dryness, light and warmth must be secured at any rate. Filling the walls with six or eight inches of buckwheat hulls will insure dryness much better than two thicknesses of inch lumber with building paper squeezed between. Windows set in rather high will give more light than lower ones. The earth makes a good floor if free from surface water.

FRUIT LADDER.

One of Simple Construction Which Will Prove Most Convenient in the Orchard.

The best ladder that I have found for picking fruit from young trees, says a correspondent of the Farm and Home, is made of two boards one inch thick, three inches wide and ten feet long. Nail one end together as shown in the cut and spread the other three feet. Nail strips, c, to hold steps, b, which should be one and one-half inches thick, four inches wide and placed 12 inches apart. Common six-penny nails are heavy enough. This ladder is light and can be placed handily in any tree. We use sacks to pick in and tie them as for sowing seed and then hang over the shoulder.

Breaks All Records.

Tom Erickson's lady goose has broken all records in the egg line. She has laid 24 eggs in 30 days, and is still laying. Tom, who is a student of "Macbeth," calls her Macduff, because she is laying on. About 15 eggs is an average setting, but this lady goose challenges all other lady geese to do half as well as she will. Bring on your geese.—Chinook Observer.

Orange Hawkweed.

Orange hawkweed is one of the bad weeds now traveling westward. It has orange-red blossoms resembling those of the garden paint-brush. Look out for it in newly seeded fields.

Striped bugs on cucumbers can be quite successfully combated by sprinkling dry plaster on the plant.

Season your care with kindness and no more affectionate friend you'll find than the horse, nor more faithful.

[illegible] Lived.

Among the negro races centenarians are extremely numerous, and it is merely because they unconsciously obey the laws of nature. They sleep so much, for instance, that a negro centenarian only spends 50 or 60 years out of his 100 awake, while a white man would be awake for 75 years of the time.

REMINDED HIM OF HOME.

Rough Weather on the Ocean Made Kansan Think He Was Back on the Farm.

A Kansan crossing the Atlantic in rough weather went out on deck when a big gale was blowing. Nobody was in sight except the captain, related "Go below there," the captain shouted. The passenger looked around to see whom he was talking to.

"You mean me?" he yelled back when he saw there was no one else in sight.

"Of course I do; go below," and the captain came alongside.

"Well, I guess not," protested the Kansan. "I'm up here to see how one of your mountain-high waves and 'terrific gales' compare with what we have in Kansas in the way of cyclones. This ain't a patch to what I've seen out our way."

A big wave broke over the deck, sweeping the Kansan aft. They picked him up with a broken leg, a twisted shoulder, a sprained wrist, and his face looked as if it had been dragged backward through a briar patch. When he came to he saw the captain.

"By gravy, cap," he said, feebly, "that reminded me of home, only it was a dern sight wetter."

CUTICURA WORKS WONDERS.

"I suffered with eczema all over my body. My face was covered; my eyebrows came out. I had tried three doctors, but did not get any better. I then went to another doctor. He thought my face would be marked for life, but my brother-in-law told me to get Cuticura. I washed with Cuticura Soap, applied Cuticura Ointment, and took Cuticura Resolvent as directed. I could brush the scales off my face like powder. Now my face is just as clean as it ever was.—Mrs. Emma White, 641 Chestnut Place, Camden, N. J., April 25, '05."

NOISES IN HER HEAD

Mrs. Reagan was a Nervous Wreck, But Dr. Williams' Pink Pills Brought Sound Health.

"Before I began to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills," said Mrs. Mary Reagan, of No. 86 Kilburn street, Fall River, Mass., recently, "I was in such a bad all the time, but now I stay up all day and do all my own work.

"I was badly run down from overwork. One day noises began in my head and almost made me crazy. My head felt as if a tight band had been put around it, and the pressure and the sounds made me so uneasy that I often had to walk the floor all night.

"My stomach was in bad shape, and I had smothering sensations. At such times my body seemed bloodless, my hands were like chalk and my face turned yellow. The doctor said I had dyspepsia in the worst form. Then my nerves gave way and I was completely prostrated. I frequently suffered from smothering sensations.

"The first box of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills that I used quieted my nerves so that I could get a good night's sleep, which was a new experience for me. Before I began to use them I was a nervous wreck and trembled at the slightest sound. I was so weak that I had to sit down and rest every few steps when I went up stairs. Now I can run up a whole flight at once. The smothering sensations have gone and the noises in my head have stopped entirely. My appearance has greatly improved, for friends who were alarmed on my account before, now say: 'How well you are looking!' My husband spent over a hundred dollars on treatment for me that was worthless, but a few boxes of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills brought me sound health."

BOONE CO. RECORDER
Wednesday, - - Sept., 13, 1905.
W. L. RIDDELL, - - Publisher.

To the Editor of the Recorder:

Dear Sir:—We have approached the season of the year when we find it absolutely necessary to secure good homes for our children. The work has increased to such an extent that we are handling between fifty and sixty children per month. In order to make the work a still greater success it is necessary for the best citizens to offer their homes for these children. We will appreciate it very much if you will insert the following notice in your paper. We are not in a position to pay for this notice as our funds are now exceedingly low and I sincerely trust that you will show this much interest in the destitute, homeless children of our Commonwealth, by helping us to place them in good homes. Thanking you in advance for your kindness, and trusting that you will send me a copy of the paper which contains the enclosed article and hoping to have the pleasure of thanking you personally soon, I remain

Yours very Respectfully,
GEORGE L. SEHON,
State Superintendent.

HELP A CHILD TO FIND A HOME.

The Kentucky Childrens' Home Society has grown to be one of the greatest child saving Agencies in America. The success of the work is due to the good people of our State who have opened their hearts and homes to the homeless, destitute children under our care. Sixty or seventy bright, sweet children are sent to us each month and it is necessary in order to provide for other neglected little ones to find good homes for the children now under our care. Have you a child in your home? If you have, do you not think you could take another little one to raise and rear into good citizenship? Will you not help us by giving a home or finding a home for a child of any age from infancy to girls and boys of twelve years of age? The Master said: "In as much as ye have done it to one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me." If you are interested in the work, write for particulars to George L. Sehon, State Supt. Room 515 Masonic Building, Louisville, Ky.

According to the medical gentlemen who compose the State Board of Health, the real danger in Kentucky lies not in yellow fever, but in typhoid fever. More people die in this State from the latter disease every month than have ever died here from the yellow fever. We had better concern ourselves about the real plague at home. The 13,305 cases last year could have been prevented, they say, and assert further that malaria fever can be prevented by the same precautions that are required to prevent yellow fever. Screening houses will practically eliminate both typhoid and malaria fevers in Kentucky.—Ex.

Every rope in use in the British navy has a red thread woven into it. Any rope so woven which is found outside the navy is supposed to have been stolen, and is promptly confiscated. This custom has been in vogue since the days of Nelson.

The office of the Georgetown News and Democrat was destroyed by fire, last Saturday night. Bro. Gaines has the RECORDER's sympathy in his misfortune. The two papers will soon be on their feet again as their editor is a hustler.

Robert Bacon, the new Assistant Secretary of State, is a director of seventeen big corporations, including the United States Steel Corporations. He was until 1903 a junior partner of J. Pierpont Morgan.

Director of the Mint, Roberts, estimates an increase of $7,000,000 in gold production in 1904 over the previous year. He estimates the increase in silver at 3,486,000 fine ounces.

A Confederate veteran, in his uniform of gray, received an ovation at the G. A. R. parade in Denver. Fifteen thousand men were in the line of march.

The RECORDER acknowledges the receipt of a press ticket which entitles it to all the privileges of the State Fair at Lexington, September 18-25.

Bro. Green, of the Owen Democrat, will quit farming so soon as he can sell his farm bell.

The yellow fever is under control in New Orleans.

Her father owns a high-spirited young mare, which Miss Jennie mounted to ride over to town, a distance of a quarter of mile. She had no sooner gained her place in the saddle than the animal began running. When about half the distance had been gone Miss Jennie discovered she could not rein the animal in, and it ran at the top of its speed until the center of the town was reached when she was thrown off. Fortunately only a few severe bruises resulted from her fall.

B. J. KOLB, Pastor.

James L. Clore was surprised, last Wednesday, when he read the RECORDER, to learn that his little daughter had found at the fair a pocket book containing $25. Had Mr. Clore been consulted the truth of the matter would have been learned, which is this: The little girl did find a pocket book, but it was for carrying visiting and other cards, and contained about 25 visiting cards on which is the name, "Mrs. Emily Johnson," a Canadian 25 cent shinplaster and two Alms & Doepke bus tickets. How the report got started that the little girl had found $25 is not known. This is to correct the mistake.

Late Saturday afternoon there were rumors on the street that the James & Mayer Buggy Company had made an assignment. Later it became known that W. H. O'Brien had been appointed agent for the creditors, to whom the company is indebted somewhere between $80,000 and $100,000, the exact amount not yet being determined. The assets, including real estate, machinery, stock on hand and good accounts, are estimated at $125,000. James & Mayer Buggy Company came to Lawrenceburg from Cincinnati in 1890. It has had at times more than 150 employes, but at present there are only about half that number. The pay roll during these 15 years has varied from $700 to $2,300 a week, nearly all of which went into circulation.—Lawrenceburg Press.

It is due Alvin Perry, of Independence, who is serving the North Kentucky Agricultural Association so acceptably as secretary, to say that few if any secretaries of like organization are so proficient in their work. He has a system of keeping his books that cannot be excelled, and whereby he is able at any moment to tell exactly the progress of his work, and by which the treasurer is enabled to pay to exhibitors their premiums as fast as they are awarded. It is this excellent system which Mr. Perry introduced, supplemented with the business like administration of the office of treasurer by Arthur Rouse while he was in office, that afforded prize takers so much satisfaction at the fair. As soon as the strings are tied in the ring the fortunate exhibitors can call on the treasurer and get their money. No checks nor certificates are issued to put the holders to extra trouble. They get the cold cash and put it in their pockets and the transaction is closed to the satisfaction of all. And besides being a good secretary Mr. Perry is a good worker in the interest of the fair, and, is the right man in the right place.

Mr. J. T. Crenshaw, of the Fair Grounds Stables, continues to gather in a liberal share of equine premiums at each succeeding Fair he attends. His string of horses are top-notchers in the show ring and Mr. Crenshaw has few peers as a reinsman or in the saddle. At Florence last week he captured a nice bunch of blue and red ties, which footed up nearly $500. On Saturday he captured both ties in the stake for all-purpose horse, mare or gelding, the sum total being $150. Miss Mary E. Crenshaw, who is likewise one of the most accomplished equestriennes and drivers in the State, captured the beautiful $25 silver service presented by ex-Congressman Goodh to the best lady driver. Mr. Crenshaw and Miss Crenshaw won first premium for best lady and gent rider. Other premiums won were as follows: Model stallion, aged saddle mare, saddle stallion, three-year-old saddle mare, sweepstake saddle stallion, mare or gelding, best year-old stallion, mare or gelding, 2d premium for high stepper, 2d in fancy single turnout, colt any sex one year three-year-old stallion, mare or gelding, mare or gelding under 5 years, stallion and two colts, and several other second ties. Mr. Crenshaw is at Alexandria this week with his stable of horses.—Pendletonian.

Boones 3; Walton 0.

The Walton base ball team came over last Saturday and hooked up with the Boones on their grounds. It was a fast game from start to finish, and until the close of the eigth inning the game was anybody's. The Walton team had Bonno, a professional twirler in the box, but to the Boones he looked just like anyother pitcher. For seven innings not a man could either team put across the home plate, but in the eighth the Boones lifted the lid off and it was all over. Kirkpatrick, the first man up, got his base on an error, Walton followed with a hit to left field. Slayback went out on a fly to center. Conner then came along with a terrific drive to center field for three bases, scoring Kirkpatrick and Walton. Conner afterwards made his score on an error at second. Brady who followed Conner was hit between first and second by a ball batted by Hawes, and Bullock fanned, closing the inning. In the ninth inning Nicholson got first on an error by Conner; Fullilove drove a long fly to deep center, of which Luck made a magnificent catch, and threw Nicholson out in his effort to return to first. Fink struck out and the agony was over. Following is the score by innings:

Hits—For Boones—Walton 2, Conner, Kirkpatrick; three bagger—Conner. Total hits—5. For Walton—Byland, Bonno 2; two base hit Bonno—total hits 4. Umpires—Diekey and Riddell.

Struck out—By Conner 10; by Bonno 11.

The Boones and the Bellevue teams will play at Bellevue next Friday afternoon.

No More Ringers.

In my proposition to play a series of games of base ball with the teams in this county for the championship of the county, I stated plainly that the teams must be composed of Boone county players, and under no circumstances will the Boones play another game in which the opposing teams is not composed entirely of known Boone county players. The Boones will act in good faith in this matter, and unless other clubs do there will be no more games for said championship. L. H. CRISLER,

As there appears to be a misunderstanding as to the conditions and the time for the beginning of the series, as set out in the proposition of Dr. Crisler, manager of the Boone base ball team, to play a series of three games for the championship of Boone county—the challenge which was accepted by two teams, the challenge is published again. It was published August 23d, and is as follows:

"Dr. Crisler, manager of the Boone base ball team, has placed a chip on his shoulder, and challenges any team in the county for a series of three games, series to begin after September 1st. County teams may double up, but no foreign talent will be played."

Walter Riddell exhibited Albert Conner's stallion, Max Ledger, at the Alexandria fair, last week, and captured a blue tie. Walter was the lucky exhibitor in six or seven other rings.

The German naval authorities have decided to build a second entrance to the Kaiser Wilhelm canal, connecting the Baltic with the North sea. Both the new mouth and the old will be strongly fortified with heavy guns.

An English master mariner named Death has had his name changed. He said, in explanation, that he was now acting as first officer, but expected soon to have command of a ship. He was afraid that few passengers would care about risking a voyage in a ship captained by Death.

We pay but slight attention to the loss of a ship these days unless many lives are sacrificed. Therefore it is surprising to know that in the heavy storms of last April 113 vessels were destroyed, of which 77 were propelled by sails and 36 by steam. In addition, 376 suffered damages.

President Loubet, of France, has intimated that he will not seek a re-election, but will retire at the end of his term next year. His reasons are said to be that the president of France is too much of a figurehead, and that a second term might easily degenerate into a life tenure, which would be dangerous to the republic. Besides, Mr. Loubet wishes to give the other aspirants a chance.

Alaska may have its drawbacks as to winter climate, but every baseball-loving boy would certainly like to live there in summer. With daylight every minute of the 24 hours and the most popular time for playing the national game from 8 o'clock in the evening to midnight, and nothing in the way of work to prevent, everybody is free to go to the ball game. And most everybody promptly and enthusiastically does go.

The artificial eyebrow is the latest fad in beauty of the "applied" order. The eyebrows, sometime made singly, cost from $1.50 to $2.50 per pair, according to the grade of the work of construction, the work being always necessarily of fine order. And anyone from eight to twenty pairs may be annually needed by the beauty seeker who would thus remedy nature's defects in the matter of eyebrows. But the game is well worth the candle for most of the faces so improved.

One of the familiar tests by which the chemist recognizes the presence of arsenic is the odor of garlic given off when one of its compounds is heated before the blowpipe flame. The same smell of garlic is produced when certain fungi grow or substances containing arsenic. And it is interesting to note that one species of fungus is found to accomplish this feat of chemical analysis more effectively when it is grown in connection with yellow algal cells—in other words, when it forms the plant association known as lichen.

Much interest has recently been excited by a remarkable dinner party given in London, at which 24 people sat down and which cost £3,000. Many high-class chefs who know the mysteries of their business are inclined to say that this was really dear after all. It could have been done to cost much more if it had been necessary, and that in a quite legitimate manner. The most expensive dish that can be served is Chinese bird's nest soup, which can hardly be had for less than 15s an ounce, which means £7 10s for a moderate plate.

For the average man who racks his brains to make domestic ends meet on £2 a week there is something startling in the light recently thrown on the life and habits of Mr. Arnold Dunlap, of England, the octogenarian millionaire, who died a few days ago. Mr. Dunlap's housekeeper leaves, among many other strange items, that during 40 years this owner of millions only purchased one suit of clothes, a cheap pair of grey trousers and two overcoats; while four hats, at a shilling each, were all the covering required for 15 years.

A Salute Was Fired at the Portsmouth Navy Yard.

Rain, Which Had Been Falling, Ceased and the Sun, Which Had Been Invisible For Three Days, Shone Forth.

Portsmouth, N. H., Sept. 6.—The treaty of peace between Russia and Japan was signed by the representatives of the empires at 3:47 p. m. Tuesday. On the instant of the consummation of the great historical act, a salute was fired at the United States navy yard on Kittery Point.

Mr. Witte, accompanied by Baron De Rosen and Mr. Plancon, left the hotel for the navy yard at 2:30 p. m. The rain, which had been falling in torrents for half an hour previously to this time, suddenly ceased and the sun, which had not been visible for three days, shone forth.

Baron Komura, pointing at the sun, said smilingly: "It is a good omen for peace."

Baron Komura, Minister Takahira and Mr. Dennison, the legal adviser of the Japanese envoys, left at 2:48 in an automobile for the navy yard. They were greeted by the guests of the hotel gathered on the veranda to witness their departure. Bishop Henry C. Potter, of New York, was among the number.

Mr Witte, the chief of the Russian plenipotentiaries, was the first to sign his name to the treaty. After the ceremonies of the signing of the treaty Baron De Rosen delivered a short speech, pointing out the importance of the event and the influence it will have in the relations between the two countries. He ended by expressing the satisfaction he felt at the good relations which have characterized the work of the plenipotentiaries. Baron Komura replied, paraphrasing Baron De Rosen's speech and expressing his thanks for the kind words addressed to himself and the members of his mission.

The entire Russian mission headed by Mr. Witte attended a thanksgiving service celebrated in Christ Episcopal church both by American and Russian clergymen.

Synopsis of Treaty.

Following is a synopsis of the peace treaty, which may be the most important historical feature of the 20th century:

The instrument opens with a preamble, reciting that his majesty, the emperor, the autocrat of all the Russias, and his majesty, the emperor of Japan, desiring to close the war, and having appointed their respective plenipotentiaries, have come to an agreement on a treaty of peace.

Article 1 stipulates for the re-establishment of friendship between the two empires. In article 2 the emperor of Russia recognizes the preponderant political, military and economical interest of Japan in Korea, and stipulates that Russia will not oppose any measures for its government that Japan will deem necessary to take in Korea. It is mutually agreed in Article 3 that Manchuria shall be evacuated by both armies. All rights acquired by private persons and companies shall remain intact.

The rights possessed by Russia in conformity with the lease by Russia of Port Arthur and Dalny, together with the land and waters adjacent, shall pass over in their entirety to Japan, but the properties and rights of Russian subjects are to be safe-guarded and respected.

It is agreed not to put any obstacles to the general measures (which shall be alike for all nations) that China may take for the development and commercial and industrial work in Manchuria. The Manchurian railway shall be operated jointly between Russia and Japan at Kouang Tchen. Russia cedes to Japan the southern part of Saghalin island as far north as the 50th degree of north latitude, together with the islands depending thereon. The rights of free navigation is assured in the bays of La Perouse and Tartars.

Article 10 recites the situation of Russian subjects on the southern part of Saghalin island, and stipulates that Russian colonists there shall be free and shall have the right to remain without changing their nationality.

Russia engages herself to make an agreement with Japan giving to Japanese subjects the right to fish in Russian territorial waters of the Sea of Japan, the Sea of Okhotsk and Bering Sea. The commercial treaty existing between the two governments prior to the war will be renewed. Russia and Japan engage to restitute their prisoners of war on paying the real cost of keeping the same, such claim for cost to be supported by documents.

The evacuation of Manchuria by both armies shall be completed within 18 months after the signing of the treaty. At the expiration of the 18 months the two parties will only be able to leave as guards for the railway 15 soldiers per kilometer.

The recent discovery that alloys not containing iron can be made as magnetic as iron has suggested the new theory that magnetism depends upon the grouping of the molecules. HONEST PHYSICIAN

Works with Himself First.

It is a mistake to assume that physicians are always skeptical as to the curative properties of anything else than drugs.

Indeed, the best doctors are those who seek to heal with as little use of drugs as possible and by the use of correct food and drink. A physician writes from Calif. to tell how he made a well man of himself with Nature's remedy:

"Before I came from Europe, where I was born," he says, "it was my custom to take coffee with milk (cafe au lait) with my morning meal, a small cup (cafe noir) after my dinner and two or three additional small cups at my club during the evening.

"In time nervous symptoms developed, with pains in the cardiac region, and accompanied by great depression of spirits, despondency—in brief, 'the blues.' I at first tried medicines, but got no relief and at last realized that all my troubles were caused by coffee. I thereupon quit its use forthwith, substituting English Breakfast Tea.

"The tea seemed to help me at first, but in time the old distressing symptoms returned, and I quit it also, and tried to use milk for my table beverage. This I was compelled however to abandon speedily for while it relieved the nervousness somewhat, it brought on constipation. Then by a happy inspiration I was led to try the Postum Food Coffee. This was some months ago and I still use it. I am no longer nervous, nor do I suffer from the pains about the heart, while my 'blues' have left me and life is bright to me once more. I know that leaving off coffee and using Postum healed me, and I make it a rule to advise my patients to use it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

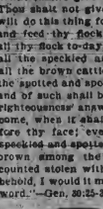
JACOB AT HARAN



PART III.—SERVING FOR LABAN'S CATTLE

OUR BIBLE STORY by the Highway and Byway Reader

(A Vision Between Heaven and Earth Inspired Word.)

(Copyright, 1906, by J. M. Sloan.)

Scripture Authority.—"And it came to pass, when Rachel had borne Joseph, that Jacob said unto Laban, Send me away, that I may go unto mine own place, and to my country. Give me my wives and my children, for whom I have served thee, and let me go; for thou knowest my service which I have done thee." And Laban said unto him, I pray thee, if I have found favor in thine eyes, tarry; for I have learned by experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake. And he said, Appoint me thy wages, and I will give it. And he said unto him, Thou knowest how I have served thee, and how thy cattle was with me. For it was little which thou hadst before I came, and it is now increased unto a multitude; and the Lord hath blessed thee since my coming; and now when shall I provide for mine own house also? And he said, What shall I give thee? And Jacob said, Thou shalt not give me anything; if thou will do this thing for me, I will again keep and feed thy flock. I will pass through all thy flock today, removing from thence all the speckled and spotted cattle, and all the brown cattle among the sheep, and the spotted and speckled among the goats; and of such shall be my hire. So shall my righteousness answer for me in time to come, when it shall come for my hire before thy face; every one that is not speckled and spotted among the goats, and brown among the sheep, that shall be counted stolen with me. And Laban said, Behold, I would it might be according to thy word."—Gen. 30:25-34.

RACHEL stood in the tent door humming a little lullaby to the babe which rested in her arms. Her body swayed gently with the rythm of the music as she rocked him to and fro, and her eyes rested upon his face lovingly for a moment and then looked out longingly over the surrounding landscape as though searching for some one whom she was expecting.

"Why does he not come?" she exclaimed, anxiously. "Bilhah," she called, addressing her maid within, "did not father Laban say that he would send Jacob word?"

"He did, but he seemed displeased, and muttered as he turned away something about Jacob leaving his flocks too much."

Rachel's brow clouded. She felt the injustice of her father's exactions. He was a hard taskmaster, and begrudged Jacob the time of his visits home, which during the past year had been more frequent than usual, for he was full of tender solicitude for her. But now he had been away fully a month.

"Go, Bilhah," she urged, impatiently, "ask father Laban why Jacob comes not."

And as the woman hastened off, Rachel continued to look away across the fields. How lonely her heart felt that evening. She longed to share with her beloved Jacob the joy of her son's birth. How proud and glad, he would be. How through the years their hearts had yearned for God's favor. And now with their hopes and prayers realized Jacob was absent from her, and she felt that the glad event was robbed of half its joy.

"Ah, precious baby," she murmured, "how hard it is to wait."

"To wait for what, my love?" exclaimed a voice, and the next moment she found herself in Jacob's strong arms.

"Oh, Jacob, see!" holding up the baby, "it's a boy—our boy!"

"Yes, I know," responded Jacob, taking the little one tenderly in his arms, and looking at him with proud eyes. "I met Bilhah as she was on her way to Laban's, and she told me the glad news." And then in answer to his wife's questions he went on to explain how Laban had visited the flocks nearly two weeks before and had objected to his leaving them at that time, declaring ill-naturedly that he was neglecting his work, and so he had remained, knowing that but a few more days remained of his seven years of service.

"And now we are free. Your father has no further claim upon us."

"And what will you do now?" Rachel asked, wonderingly, not comprehending the full meaning of the situation.

"Do? Has not God kept me during all these years of hardship and toil, and now He has done this that He has given me a son of thee. I would return unto the land of my fathers."

"But how? We have nothing we can call our own."

Jacob stared at his wife, while conflicting emotions of blank astonishment, disappointment and indignation played over his features. His mind had been so elated over the thought that his years of servitude were ended and that he could now return to the land God had promised to give him and his seed as a possession that he had not thought of his poverty. He remembered all the 14 years of faithful service. He had taken Laban's few flocks and herds, and under his care they had become vast possessions. But it was all Laban's.

"Fourteen years," he said slowly; "but I have thee," he exclaimed, with sudden emotion, placing his arm about his beloved Rachel and drawing her to him.

"And the baby," she added, smiling into his face as she took and fondled him to her breast. "But that does not give us camels and asses to ride on and flocks to nourish us on the journey."

"Nay, but we have God. We can trust Him. Did He not lead my feet thither? And will He not lead us back? He has promised us the land. He will provide."

But when next day Jacob broached the subject of his going to Laban, that individual was filled with disappointment and alarm. How could he get along without Jacob? He knew only too well how much he owed his prosperity to the faithful services of his nephew.

"Tarry thou must, for I have learned by experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake. Appoint me thy wages, and I will give it."

Jacob was silent. He was eager to get away, in fact he had quite made up his mind that he would go, but did the Lord want him to depart empty handed? Would it be faith to rush off impatiently and expect God to provide for his wives and little ones? Or would real faith keep him patient in the present situation? Was not it probable that it was God's way of providing for him? God had blessed his services so marvelously during the 14 years he had worked for Laban, would He not continue His favor now that he was to provide for his own household? All these questions flashed through Jacob's mind as he stood before Laban, who anxiously awaited his answer. At last he looked up and said, quietly:

"I will continue with you."

"And what shall thy wages be?" Laban asked, eagerly, anxious to have the bargain concluded.

"Thou shalt not give me anything," he finally said, looking steadily into Laban's face, and drawing himself up proudly.

"But," exclaimed Laban, his face paling, "you said you would remain."

"Yea, if thou will do this thing for me, I will again feed and keep thy flock. I will pass through all thy flock to-day, removing from thence all the speckled and spotted cattle, and all the brown cattle among the sheep, and the spotted and speckled among the goats; and of such shall be my hire. So shall my righteousness answer for me in time to come, when it shall come for my hire before thy face: every one that is not speckled and spotted among the goats and brown among the sheep, that shall be counted stolen with me."

Laban listened to the remarkable proposition in amazement.

"Behold, I would it might be according to thy word, but surely thou art joking."

"Nay," rejoined Jacob, calmly, "those are the terms on which I would serve thee."

"Be it as thou hast said, then," said Laban, trying to conceal the inward exultation of his miserly soul.

And that day he and his sons removed the he goats that were ring-streaked and spotted, and all the she goats that were speckled and spotted, every one that had some white in it, and all the brown among the sheep, and gave them into the hand of his sons. And he sent Jacob with the remainder of the flocks a three days' journey down the valley, and as he started off with his all white sheep and all black goats he chuckled to himself, saying:

"Never a speckled and spotted one will he get out of those flocks."

The months rolled by, and so diligently did Jacob apply himself to the task in hand that his visits home were few and far between, and to Laban's questions as to how he was getting on he returned but brief and indefinite answer. At last, unable to curb his curiosity longer, he sent one of his sons to spy on Jacob, and the reports which he brought first astonished and then alarmed him. The finest of lambs and the kids were speckled and spotted. How could it be? It was nothing short of a miracle. Nothing like it had ever been done before. Laban went in before his gods and bowed himself and burned incense to them that he might win their favor. And then, not certain that he could trust them to protect his interests, he posted off to where Jacob was feeding his flocks and indignantly charged him with fraud and insisted on changing the agreement so that the speckled and spotted should thereafter be his. And Jacob quietly submitted, and went on feeding the flocks. And when Laban found months later that no longer was the increase of the flocks speckled and spotted, he again changed the agreement, and again Jacob submitted, knowing that he was in God's hands and that he could trust Him. And thus the years rolled by and Laban had changed his wages ten times. But still he patiently served on, and in spite of Laban's double dealing, he increased exceedingly and had much cattle, and maid-servants and men-servants, and camels and asses.

On one of his visits home Jacob chanced to be passing the sheep fold of Laban, and, hearing loud and angry talking, he paused to listen. He recognized the voices at once as those of Laban's sons:

"See how he hath stolen that which was our father's. I tell you if it continue there will not be left anything that we can call our own."

And then the voices were lowered, and all that Jacob could catch was: "After sheep shearing . . . settle matter . . . fix him."

He had always gone with them to shear the sheep. He had returned home for that express purpose. So skilled a hand as he Laban never failed to secure, but that night when he asked Laban if he was not to go with them, he had replied, surlily: "No. Tend to your own business."

What could it mean? Did they seek his hurt? What had he done to merit such treatment? Fearful and troubled, he could not sleep, and at last rising he went forth into the night.

THE RECIPROCAL TARIFF.

An Idea That Is Not New, Neither Is It by Any Means Feasible.

The proposal made at the reciprocity conference to substitute a "high and low" tariff for trade treaties is merely another way of achieving the same end. It is not a new idea and there is no particular indication that it is an improvement over the old one, says the Detroit Free Press. Without questioning either the sincerity or the enthusiasm of the delegates we may nevertheless nurse misgivings when a party to such a conference states expressly that reciprocity and free trade are synonomous terms and neither, therefore, to be accepted as an evidence of anything but heresy. The public will be pardoned at this time for being skeptical and retaining a little fear that the stand-patters have stolen into the camp of the enemy and are beginning to fight them from behind also.

It is a matter of easy recollection that the Dingley tariff was at its inception paraded not only as a protective measure which met all the demands of the tariff zealots, but it was also a kind of self-operating arrangement which would force other countries into making tariff concessions in our favor. On this understanding dozens of votes which would otherwise have been hostile were secured for the bill. It was an excellent forcing measure. Foreign countries met our commissioner more than half way for the negotiation of trade treaties. But the senate pigeonholed them all. We have a tariff whose average schedules are higher than meet general approval and we have no reciprocity treaties.

Now it is assumed that a "high and low" tariff would meet all the requirements of the situation and be most likely to become a law. Doubtless it would, but it is easy to foresee that some condition would be interposed to make its automatic operation impossible and the net result would be a tariff changed in some particulars, but with schedules of as high average as those we have now. When a representative reciprocity conference begins to yield in a single point, experience dictates that it is pertinent to think there is something amiss.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT BELATED

An Increase in Cost of Living Is Admitted by Recent Federal Statistics.

A little while before the last presidential election, it will be remembered, a report was issued by the department of commerce and labor to show that there has been in recent years no substantial increase in the prices of necessaries of living. Although the astonishing partisan report, in the face of so much evidence to the contrary, was vehemently attacked by the democrats, the time was too short to thoroughly expose its widely propagated errors. The report served its partisan purpose and that was enough for its supporters and promoters, says the Philadelphia Record.

But a new report from the same official source renders belated homage to the truth. From this report it appears that from 1890 to 1904—with the exception of the period of 1893-1896—the prices of necessaries of living have steadily advanced. Of 25 staple articles in the use of every family the prices are shown to be higher in 1904 than in the years from 1890 to 1900, and there appears in 1905 no check to the upward tendency.

Perfidiously as the facts have been perverted for partisan ends, this is no news to fathers of families and housewives who pay the weekly market bills. Nor is there any mystery as to the chief cause of the economic phenomenon. To all who have seriously considered the subject the cause lies in a spoliatory tariff system which favors the trusts and monopolies at the expense of the masses of the American people. The only question is how long the "stand-patters" will be able to persuade the victims to continue the worship of the tariff fetich to which they are now making so many sacrifices.

Amuses Trust Barons.

The air seems to be surcharged with graft and no department of the government is entirely clear of it. The latest frauds have come to light in army circles at Schuylkill arsenal, Philadelphia, where Maj. Strong has been investigating and reports: "While I have not concluded my work here, I think I have certain evidence to prove that the government has been defrauded in large amounts." With corruption and graft prevalent and a republican congress noted for lavish appropriations, no wonder there is a large deficit for the fiscal year just past and the two first months of the present year promising a still greater difference between receipts and expenditures. Keep on voting for the "corrupt old party" and you will get still more taxes to pay before long and the trust barons will laugh at you as good geese for picking.

——Even with a "dual tariff," however, there is considerable fear that the consumer would only get the hot end of it.—Indianapolis News.

——It is not true that the chief object of President Roosevelt's administration is to give as many men as possible brief prominence in a cabinet position.—Boston Globe.

——The moral health of the public service was never at such a low ebb as to-day. Everywhere graft is charged and in most cases proven. When the republican majority of the house of representatives voted to loot the treasury for the mileage graft it was virtually noticed that to "make money honestly, if you can, but make money," was the inspiring motive for office holding.

RUSSIAN ENVOYS.

M. Witte and Baron Rosen Spent a Day in the National Capital.

Washington, Sept. 11.—M. Witte and Baron Rosen, the Russian peace plenipotentiaries, accompanied by five members of the former's suite, spent Sunday in Washington. They arrived here at an early hour in the morning and spent the entire day visiting the historic points in and about the city and left again late in the afternoon for New York, from which place Mr. Witte will sail for Hamburg. While here they were in charge of Acting Secretary Loomis, of the state department, and Maj. Charles McCawley, of the marine corps, who at the special request of the president acted as their escorts to the various places visited. Beginning at the white house, the party in turn went to the Russian embassy, the capitol, the congressional library, Mt. Vernon, Arlington and Rock Creek park.

From the congressional library the visitors went to Mt. Vernon, going first to the navy yard, where about noon they boarded the naval tug Sirren. The party arrived at Mt. Vernon at 1 o'clock and spent an hour and a half going through the mansion and about the grounds. A feature of the stay there was the planting of a fine, healthy ash tree on a commanding site on the terrace in front of the mansion overlooking the water. Mr. Witte and Baron Rosen each handled the spade in filling the ground about the root of the tree after it had been planted and the former asked that when it attained a growth some branches of it be sent to him for transplanting.

FATHER GREEN DEAD.

Another Roman Catholic Clergyman Succumbs To Yellow Fever.

New Orleans, Sept. 11.—Report to 6 p. m. Sunday: New cases, 27; total, 2,289; deaths 7; total deaths, 316; new foci, 11; cases under treatment, 296; discharged, 1,677.

The unfavorable part of the Sunday report is the unusually large number of deaths. Another distinguished member of the Roman Catholic clergy is in the list, Father L. E. Green, of the Jesuit college. He died at 4 o'clock Sunday afternoon after being ill exactly a week. He was struck with a chill last Sunday, just after delivering a lecture, but thought nothing of it. The next day he visited a room in the college which had been screened and made ready for emergencies in accordance with the suggestions of Dr. White and jokingly remarked to one of his colleagues that they had the room ready now and only needed the first patient. A few hours later he was the occupant. There is not a single Italian name among the other deaths.

GOLD AND SILVER PRODUCTION.

Director of the Mint Roberts Makes Public His Estimate.

Washington, Sept. 11.—Director of the Mint Roberts made public his estimate of the production of gold and silver in the United States for the calendar year 1904. These figures show an increased production over the calendar year 1903 of $7,131,500 gold and 3,486,000 fine ounces of silver. The largest gold gain was by California, which yielded about $3,000,000 more than in the previous year and a larger amount than in any year since the sixties. "This gain," the director says, "came chiefly from dredge operations and a further gain is expected during the current year and for some years to come."

RICHWOOD, KY., Sept. 4, 1905.

Editor of the Recorder:

Dear Sir:—I hand you circular that was handed me a few days ago, which I am told that 80 percent of the growers in Owen county have signed, and while it may not be the best plan, it is, I think, practical, and will work the desired end if lived up to. If you deem this worthy you may publish the circular in your paper. Respectfully,

J. C. HUGHES.

P. S. I am not a candidate, only for the good will of the growers.

Following is the circular which Mr. Hughes inclosed:

Burley Tobacco Growers' Contract.

PREAMBLE.

Whereas, the farmers of the Burley Tobacco District of Ky. have been for many years hopelessly at the mercy of the Tobacco Trust, and

Whereas, the plan of the Burley Tobacco Growers' Association, which has been submitted to the growers this year, and under which they labored last year, has proved itself to be futile and thoroughly impracticable, therefore be it resolved by the farmers of Owen County, Ky., in mass convention assembled, that the following plan of organization be substituted for the old, viz:

CONTRACT.

The parties to this contract shall consist of land owners only, who hereby organize themselves for their mutual protection, and, in consideration of 75 per cent of the land owners of the Burley Growing District signing same on or before December 24th, 1905, agree, contract and bind themselves to raise no tobacco in the year 1906, and agree further that no tobacco whatever shall be grown for the year 1906 on any land belonging to them. The parties to the contract further agree if they should sell, rent or transfer any land of which they are now possessed, that this contract shall apply to same, and no tobacco shall be grown thereon. Any lessee of lands signing this contract, shall be put in the same position as the lessor, and this agreement shall bind him in every respect as it would bind the owner of the same.

On J. H. Sleet's farm near his tobacco barn on the Beaver and Walton road, in plain view stands a thrifty polk stalk, estimated by a number of observers to be about forty feet high. We mention those things not because we think the like never occurred before, but because we think them rare. We shall give no reference as to our veracity from the simple fact that we have the goods in each case, so anyone can see them that is curious enough to doubt our statement.

Give Us a Fair Deal

To the Editor of the Recorder:

The communication of my friend, J. C. Hughes, in your last issue seems as a bomb thrown at a critical time in the midst of a multitude of tobacco growers, who are organizing to protect themselves from the impositions of a gigantic tobacco monopoly.

Knowing his intelligence and experience we expected him to come to us as a "shadow of a great rock in a weary land." He would pour cold water on us with the statement that our movement is "futile and thoroughly impracticable" and failed to tell us why. He stated that it had failed two years, when it raised the price of tobacco to the producer at least $2 on the hundred.

True, the company failed to get the money to pay for the tobacco, but they expect to get it this year from a more reliable source. I believe that success means $3 or $10 per 100 for good tobacco, and failure means $5 or $6 to the producer.

The local dealers, perhaps, would prefer to load up their ware houses with tobacco at a low price, fixed by the monopoly, and hold it for speculation. The proposed plan to raise no tobacco next year, if carried out, would cause a great commotion in our state, and cause such an exodus from the rural districts as never before was known. It seems to me that the farmers should raise the usual amount of tobacco, of good quality, and contract with the Burley Tobacco Growers' Company at a price not excessively high, but at a price fair and reasonable Give us a fair deal.

N. S. WALTON

The fourth annual convention of the Disciples of Christ, in Boone county, met at South Fork Sept. 19-18. The convention was well attended, about 500 being present, and was a success in every feature. The following ministers were present: P. H. Duncan, W. C. Gibbs, A. Sanders, H. W. Elliott, R. N. Sampson, J. W. Rogers and E. C. Riley. The social part of the convention was very enjoyable, and there was enough dinner to feed thrice the crowd. Delegates were present from nearly every church in the county and visitors from Warsaw and nearby communities were in evidence. The speeches of the convention were short, yet "brim full" of thought. Mrs. E. E. Winn, of Warsaw, favored the convention with two solos. The Committee on Resolutions recommended that next year the churches endeavor to locate men, the following churches cooperating as a unit: Erlanger, Florence and Pt. Pleasant; Walton, Beaverlick and South Fork; and Bullittsville, Bellevue and Petersburg. This matter should be taken up by the churches at once. The next convention will be held at Bullittsville in October, 1906.

AMERICAN RULES A TINY KINGDOM

William Cary, of Oakland, Cal., Is Absolute Monarch of the Isle of the Calf of Man.

POPULATION OF THE DOMAIN IS FORTY-ONE

Remarkable Story of Royal Sovereign and His Country—Prefers Native State to His Island and Is Ready and Willing to Sell Latter.

New York.—Would you be a king? Would you, like Robinson Crusoe, be "monarch of all you survey?" Not an imaginary ruler such as you see in the comic operas of the day, but the real thing, with the lives of your subjects at your command. If so, communicate with William L. D. Cary, of Oakland, Cal., king of the Isle of the Calf of Man, who is tired of his domain, and is willing to dispose of it to anybody who will meet his price. The kingdom comprises just 900 acres.

The king came to New York the other day. There was no visiting delegation down the bay to grant the freedom of the city to the royal visitor, but he didn't mind that a bit. He and his queen consort went to a hotel, but no flag was hung out in their honor, as there was for the Japanese and Russian envoys. "W. L. D. Cary and wife," was on the hotel register, and nothing more. There weren't any seneschals or chamberlains or gentlemen-in-waiting or equerries or secretaries or even masters of the robes, much less a common or garden valet.

Only Real American Monarch.

Mr. Cary is the only real American king. Although a section of the constitution distinctly says that no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, and that no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of congress, accept any present, office or title from any king, prince or foreign state, King William, who is an American citizen, as well as a sovereign, may snap his fingers thereat. The parliament of Great Britain has established the status of Mr. Cary. He doesn't hold any "office of profit or trust" under our government, and he hasn't "accepted" any from a foreign power.

King's Power Absolute.

King William's title to his demesne is from the same source of warranty as Edward VII.'s, king of Great Britain and the isles, emperor of India, defender of the faith. His power is even more absolute, for King Edward has no say in making the laws of Great Britain, while King Cary, of Oakland, Cal., makes all the laws of the Calf of Man. His say is absolute over his 41 subjects. But he prefers to live in Oakland, Cal.

The kingdom of William, Rex, really lies in British waters, but is not subject to British authority. What's more, the king is tired of his dominion, and you can buy his kingdom for not so much. It is on the market for sale to the highest bidder. It comprises just 900 acres.

This vest pocket kingdom lies to the southward of the Isle of Man, which is England's, all right, and it is legally denominated as the Calf of Man. It breeds the same tailless cats as does the Isle of Man, but it hasn't any Hall Caine. Its coast line is five miles long, and its chief industry is the caring for picnic parties from the Isle of Man. British waters surround it, but Great Britain can neither make laws, collect taxes nor conduct [illegible] on the Calf of Man. [illegible] gold wherever dug [illegible] Majesty William I. [illegible] the Calf of Man.

Remarkable Story of Royal Sovereign.

The story of how the Calf of Man came to be a kingdom is interesting. Way back in the cloudy past an ancestor of the Carys held his own shield over the head of the king of England during a desperate battle. The king escaped unscathed, but the Cary who saved him was desperately wounded. In recognition of his fealty and bravery the king of England gave this Cary the Isle of Man to be his to rule over forever. There W. L. D. Cary was born.

But he got tired of the limits of 900 acres when he was only a boy, and he came west. In California he made a fortune, and in Oakland he chose to make his permanent home, despite the call of the scepter from the Calf of Man. His older brother died, and the cry "The king is dead, long live the king!" summoned him from Madison street, Oakland, Cal., to his ancestral inheritance. He looked it over. Then he turned up his nose. What was the use of living there in royal splendor over 41 subjects, when a hotel in San Francisco could put him up over night for three dollars in tar better style than picknickers are cared for on the Calf of Man?

"Sell it!" ordered the king, laying down his scepter, and noting by his watch that he could catch a boat which would allow him to make the first steamer for the United States and Oakland, Cal.

Orders American Flag Raised.

And then, being a naturalized American citizen, he did just what any good American would have done—he ordered the American flag hoisted over his domain.

He knew they couldn't stop him, for that had been tried before. When his father was king Great Britain had made the attempt to tax the island, thereby putting it under the kingdom's sovereignty. The sturdy ruler took the matter to parliament and produced the original deeds. The lawmakers of England had to acknowledge that the Calf of Man was free and independent. To-day there is no cloud on the title of W. L. D. Cary's kingship.

He alone can levy taxes, make laws, pass judgment and rule generally. When King Cary got there he found things were being done on a verbal basis. Laws went by word of mouth. Leases were not written, but the tenant's word was his bond.

"Cut it out," announced his majesty, in his breezy California way. "We want to do business here."

"Because I say so," announced the king.

Valuable "Treasure Trove" Privileges

The king of Great Britain and Ireland has his "treasure trove" privilege granted him by the constitution. [illegible] precharge, money from gal[illegible]

This is no joke; and he does claim it, for much valuable wreckage is cast up on the rocks and reefs of his diminutive demesne. Great Britain put up two lighthouses on the rocky coast line, to keep vessels off the dangerous reefs, but [illegible] this careful California bringing up, promptly bought them, so that nobody could say he wasn't ruler in fact.

Furthermore, just to show his fearless American spirit, King William installed an American, a Mr. Hughes, as lighthouse keeper. Mr Hughes made his money in Liverpool, but has a summer residence on the Calf of Man. He has fitted up the lighthouse as his home, and it is a marvel of luxury in its way. Mr. Hughes is rich, but the Calf of Manxmen say he is a good lighthouse keeper. His butler stands the night watch.

Many good dollars—of course they come in the shape of sixpences—are made by the sale of a pamphlet extolling the glories of the place and recounting its romantic history. It is only 500 yards to the Isle of Man, and a ferry runs with as prosaic regularity as do the iron steamboats or the Flatbush trains. A syndicate has leased the island for five years, and is paying most comfortable dividends.

The summer girl is the chief point of interest. The legend which they buy for sixpence and read when they get back to King Edward's larger dominion was written in 1826. Here is a bit of it:

History of the Kingdom.

"Many years before these enlightened days, during that period of time which may truly be called the dark ages of the Calf, when rats and rabbits enjoyed undisputed possession of it, and man had not yet sought a residence on its barren shores, a circumstance occurred which caused a great sensation among the inhabitants of the little village which crowns the opposite shore. The portly matrons of this retired hamlet were roused from their accustomed state of torpor by the unusual appearance of a human figure upon the highest summit of the neighboring isle, apparently engaged in some laborious employment.

"Bushell, for such was the name of this solitary being, was the possessor of a small domain on the neighboring coast of Ireland. Close to his little patrimony lay the princely castle of the great O'Neil, whose only sister had been the object of Bushell's childish affections, and was the sole possessor of his more matured devotion. With O'Neil he had always lived on terms of the greatest friendship, now joining in the fatigues of the chase, now uniting in the skillful navigation of the wintry seas. But no sooner did O'Neil discover the object of his friend's affection than all their intimacy was destroyed.

"At first he contented himself with withdrawing from his society and forbidding him to approach his castle but when he found his precautions insufficient, that the lovers still met, and that the affection of Bushell was returned, he commenced a series of persecutions, which in those days were sufficient to drive Bushell from his peaceful home, to become an outcast from the haunts of men. Having thus removed the object of her affections, he hoped that his sister would soon cease to remember him. But when many months had elapsed, and Mary's sadness still remained unchanged, he determined to watch her more narrowly, and soon discovered that the intercourse, though rendered more difficult by his tyranny, was not destroyed, but that Bushell was still lurking about the neighborhood, and found means of communication with his sister.

Bushell Rescues His Sweetheart.

"Incensed at this discovery, he commanded her to prepare to embark with him in a few days for a distant convent, there to bid adieu to the vanities of the world, and conceal her errors under the sanctity of the veil. Intelligence of this cruel determination was quickly conveyed to the outlawed Bushell, who resolved upon the bold design of attacking the vessel of O'Neil and rescuing his beloved Mary from the horrors of a living tomb. The design once formed, was quickly executed, and calling together a few of his followers, a ship was quickly manned to check O'Neil's career. The vessels met amid the gloom and storm of a December night, and hideous was the din and dreadful the clamor which arose from their opposing decks.

"At length the battle drew [illegible] way, and their leader lay lifeless in the arms of his victorious enemy. But brief time was allowed for sorrow or the shout of victory.

"In this moment of dread and anxiety I was particularly struck by the appearance of one of the unhappy sailors, who, heedless of the unsteadiness of the masts, and the promptitude required to reach the cliff, bore in his arms the body of a female with which he reached the shore just as the vessel sank beneath his feet, dragging with it the mast to which he had so lately clung.

"The horror of awaiting destruction had been too much for the feeble spirit of the maiden, and as she sank into his arms when the vessel struck against that dreadful rock the silver cord was loosed, and she yielded to that death she feared.

"Many years elapsed, and I heard nothing more of the unfortunate stranger, till it accidentally came to my knowledge that a person answering to his description had landed on a small and uninhabited island called the Calf of Man."

SEQUOYAH THE NEW STATE

Why This Name Was Chosen to Designate the Former Indian Territory.

In selecting the name Sequoyah for the new state of what has hitherto been the Indian territory, the statehood constitutional committee has conferred a fitting and very proper honor upon one of the leading members of the Cherokee nation, who did more than anyone else to advance the cause of education and civilization among his tribe.

The name Sequoyah to-day is chiefly associated with the big trees of California, but when used as a botanical name the word is spelled Sequoia, says the New York Times. Probably few persons, however, know that Sequoyah, from whom the mammoth trees were named, and who is now to be honored in the name of a state, was the inventor of the Cherokee alphabet. This famous Indian, whose memory deserves to be better known, was born about 1760, and his early life was spent in the village of Tuskegee, Tenn. Among the white men he bore the name of George Guess, and as a young man was noted as a successful hunter and trapper. He possessed an inventive turn of mind and was a skillful worker in silver ornaments.

On one of his hunting expeditions he broke his leg, and during his enforced idleness Sequoyah's attention was directed toward devising an alphabet for the Cherokee language. He realized the importance of written characters among the white men, and after months of hard work he submitted to the leading men of his tribe his alphabet, consisting of 85 characters.

Sequoyah was laughed at, and even his wife called him a fool for spending so much time in making queer characters. He succeeded, however, in formulating a list of characters expressing every sound in the Cherokee tongue. It was put to a severe test. The missionaries among the Indians were quick to appreciate its value, and about 1821 Sequoyah had the supreme satisfaction of seeing his alphabet adopted by the Cherokees. With minor changes, Sequoyah's characters are in use to-day, and educators have called his alphabet one of the most perfect ever devised to express any written language. Sequoyah died in 1843.

The first printing press to use Sequoyah's alphabet was set up at New Echota, in the Indian territory, and its first issue was a copy of the Cherokee Phoenix, published in February, 1828. Within five years of the acceptance of the alphabet, over 700,000 pages of Cherokee literature were printed in the territory. Sequoyah lived to see many beneficial results accrue from his invention, if such it can be called. He was made a chief of his tribe and received many high honors from the red men before his death. His remains are buried in the future state that will bear his name.

THEY CLAIM SITE OF CITY.

Wisconsin Men Want Land on Which Idaho Town Is Built—Suit Being Heard.

La Crosse, Wis.—Edward Lawson, former registrar of deeds, and [illegible]ling W. Brown, former clerk of court here, have started suit to recover 140 acres of land, upon which is located the city of Colwell, Idaho. The suit involves a vast fortune, and hundreds of residents of Colwell are anxiously searching the titles to their property for flaws. If the claims in the lost heritage suit are true the plaintiffs, who are now both residents of West Salem, this county, are entitled to recover title to the land upon which are built the city hall, the churches and principal business buildings of Colwell.

It is claimed that immediately after the civil war Larson's father was given soldier's title to the 160 acres in Idaho, which he held to the time of his death. His widow was appointed administrator and later John Johnson, a West Salem banker, was appointed special administrator by the court. Plaintiffs claim that if the land was sold, they, as legal heirs, received no remuneration, and that the titles were not legal, as Larson and Mrs. Sterling Brown, the children, had gained their majority, and their signatures would have been necessary to legalize the warranty deed.

The suit involves hundreds of thousands of dollars, and an offer has been made to settle, but has been declined. The land company in Ida in which dealt largely in the lands in dispute has been enjoined from further transactions pending a verdict.

SEEMED PURSUED BY FATE

Gold Seeker Killed by Cars After Having Three Times Escaped Terrible Death.

Middleton, N. Y.—After having passed through three accidents, in each one of which he escaped a terrible death, Stephen Callewell settled down to live the rest of his life quietly at Phillipsport, Sullivan county. Fate still pursued him and he is dead here from injuries received by being struck by cars near his home. He was 86 years old.

Callewell was in the rush to California gold fields in 1849. He made a fortune and was returning by sea when the vessel burned. Though many were lost he was picked up. He was in a room on the fourth floor of the United States hotel at Natchez when it burned and clung by his fingers to the window sill until rescued.

Later he returned to California and was badly injured in a mine disaster, lying between life and death a long time. Having no desire to die "with his boots on" he returned home to live in quiet. He was killed while walking on the railroad track on his way home after visiting a comrade who had been in the burning ship with him.

COOD BLOOD FOR BAD

Rheumatism and Other Blood Diseases are Cured by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

"In the head winter I was at work on my knees with [illegible] against rock walls, in dampness and extremes of cold," said Mr. J. G. Meukel, of 2075 Jackson avenue, Dubuque, Iowa, in describing his experience to a reporter, "and it is not surprising that I contracted rheumatism. For three years I had attacks affecting the joints of my ankles, knees and elbows. My ankles and knees became so swollen I could scarcely walk on uneven ground and a little pressure from a stone under my feet would cause me so much pain that I would nearly sink down. I was often obliged to lie in bed for several days at a time. My friends who were similarly troubled were getting no relief from doctors and I did not feel encouraged to throw money away for nothing. By chance I read the story of Robert Yates, of the Klauer Manufacturing Co., of Dubuque, who had a very bad case of rheumatism. I decided to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, the remedy he had used. In three or four weeks after beginning to use the pills, I was much better and in three months I was well. The swelling of the joints and the tenderness disappeared, I could work steadily and for eight years I have had no return of the trouble. My whole family believe in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Both my sons use them. We consider them a household remedy that we are sure about."

What Dr. Williams' Pink Pills did for Mr. Meukel they are doing for hundreds of others. Every dose sends galloping through the veins, pure, strong, rich, red blood that strikes straight at the cause of all ill health. The new blood restores regularity, and braces all the organs for their special tasks. Get the genuine Dr. Williams' Pink Pills at your druggists' or direct from the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N.Y.

JACOB'S FLIGHT FROM HARAN

OUR BIBLE STORY by the "Highway and Byway" Preacher (A Story Between the Lines of God's Inspired Word.)

(Copyright, 1903, by J. M. Bixes.)

Scripture Authority.—"And the Lord said unto Jacob, Return unto the land of thy fathers, and to thy kindred; and I will be with thee. . . . Then Jacob rose up, and set his sons and his wives upon camels; and he carried away all his cattle, and all his goods which he had gotten, the cattle of his getting, which he had gotten in Padna-aram, for to go to Isaac his father in the land of Canaan. And Laban went to shear his sheep; and Rachel had stolen the images that were her father's. And Jacob stole away unawares to Laban the Syrian, in that he told him not that he fled. So he fled with all that he had; and he rose up and passed over the river, and set his face towards the mount Gilead. And it was told Laban on the third day that Jacob was fled. And he took his brethren with him, and pursued after him seven days' journey; and they overtook him in the mount Gilead."—Gen. 31:3, 17-23. Read all of chapter 31.

JACOB never paused until he was in the midst of his flocks. He could think better there. He felt more at home there. He looked about him. In the clear starlight he could see the cattle browsing quietly, and it calmed his troubled spirit. His thoughts went back over the past six years. He recalled the unfair dealings of Laban, of how time and time again he had changed his wages, and how in spite of it all he had prospered.

"God hath given me these," he thought, gratefully, as he lifted his eyes toward Heaven. The glittering field of stars seemed to speak to his heart a message of hope and certainty. Why need he fear when God had spoken good concerning him? He remembered how six years before he had determined to return to Canaan, and again the longing seized him to go back. But what of Laban? He feared him. What should he do? In his perplexity and anxiety he lifted his heart to God, and cried:

"Oh, Lord! Whither shall I turn?" And in the stillness of the night a voice came to him, and said:

"Return unto the land of thy fathers, and to thy kindred; and I will be with thee."

As the day broke and the ascending rays of the advancing sun greeted him like messengers of good omen, he felt the purpose of a new confidence and hope taking possession of him, and acting at once upon the words which the Lord had just spoken, he dispatched one of his servants with a message to Rachel and Leah, calling them to the field to him. And when they had come and he had told them all, with the loyalty and devotion of true womanhood they both exclaimed:

"Whatsoever God hath said unto thee, do."

"Yea, why should we tarry?" said Leah; "is there yet any portion of inheritance for us in our father's house?"

"Nay, worse than that," Rachel exclaimed, bitterly, "we are counted of him as strangers. And hath he not sold us, and quite devoured also our dower. All the riches which God hath taken from our father, that is ours, and our children's."

"But when shall we go?" Jacob asked, getting back to the real matter in hand.

"At once! To-day!" urged Rachel. "Father Laban and the boys left early this morning to shear the sheep, and will be gone some days."

And so it was arranged, and hasty preparations were begun at once for departure.

During the work of packing up Rachel discovered an earthenware jar which she some time before had borrowed from her father, and, returning it to his tent, her eyes fell upon the images of her father's gods standing in their place of honor over his couch. Brought up as she had been in the atmosphere of the heathen worship, it is not strange that these images held over her a peculiar power, from which Jacob and his devotion to the true God had not been sufficient to wean her. She believed in Jacob's God, and yet there was still the strong superstition and admiration for the symbols of her father's religion. They were about to depart to what to her was a strange land and unknown people. Did they not need the favor of all the gods? She bowed herself in worship, and then, as she arose, a longing seized her to take the images with her. She reached up and took them in her hands, and as she did so the words of Jacob came to her which he had spoken that morning as she and Leah had started back to prepare for the journey.

"Be sure," he said, "that ye take nothing that belongeth to Laban, thy father, lest he should have just cause against us."

"But he meant household goods and such like," she argued with herself, as she concealed the images under her robe. "And, anyway, these are the family gods, and they belong to Leah and me as much as to anyone else."

"But," said a voice within, "it will offend Jacob's God," and she remembered how Jacob had told her that there was but one God, and He an invisible one, and that it was displeasing [illegible] to have images and [illegible] in worship.

"Why can't I have both?" she exclaimed impatiently. "Why can't I have the gods of my father and the God of Jacob, too? In the land to which we are going I will find no gods like these, and what would I do if Jacob's God should fail me?"

Thus staging to the temptation, she slipped stealthily out of the tent and concealed them in the saddle of her camel.

That day and the next and the next Jacob pressed forward with his wives and children and all his substance. And on the third day after his departure there came a messenger to Laban, telling him that Jacob had fled.

"I was passing the place where his tents had been pitched and his flocks had fed," explained the servant, "and I found it desolate, and while I was in doubt as to what it meant, I met a traveler from the south who told me of meeting with a big caravan making its way to the southward, and from his description it could have been none other than that of Jacob."

Laban dropped his shears and stared in astonishment at the speaker, while his sons jumped to their feet, exclaiming, fiercely:

"He has escaped us. Could some one have warned him?"

"Let us pursue after him," cried Laban, now thoroughly aroused. "Surely we can overtake him, for with his flocks and herds and wives and little ones he cannot move swiftly."

Late on the afternoon of the seventh day they came in sight of the rear portion of Jacob's caravan, as it was winding up over the rocky pathway of Mount Gilead.

"See, there they are! To-morrow early we will fall upon them and recover our daughters and our substance," Laban cried, exultantly.

"Nay, let us not delay," urged the sons. "Ere nightfall we can gain the outer border of their camp and then, when darkness has come, we can fall upon them."

"Not so, my sons," Laban objected, "lest in the darkness some harm come to the women and the children, and the flocks and herds be scattered and lost in the mountains."

And that night God came to Laban in a dream, and said unto him:

"Take heed what thou doest. Speak not to Jacob, either good or bad."

Laban started up in terror. What was it? Had he been dreaming? or had some awful voice spoken to him? He shouted to his sons, and as they came hurrying to him he asked if they had heard anything. And then he told them his dream.

"I must have been Jacob's God," concluded Laban, "who spoke to me, for what other God is in all the world so powerful? And a strange fear fell upon them all, and next day when they overtook Jacob, and came upon his camp, they offered no violence, but instead, Laban chided Jacob, saying:

"What has thou done that thou hast stolen away unawares to me, and carried away my daughters, as captives taken with the sword? Wherefore didst thou flee away secretly, and steal away from me; and didst not tell me, that I might have sent thee away with mirth, and with songs, with tabret, and with harp? And hast not suffered me to kiss my sons and my daughters? Thou hast done foolishly in so doing. It is in the power of my hand to do thee hurt; but the God of your father spake unto me, saying: 'Take thou heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad.' And now, though thou wouldst needs be gone, because thou sore longedst after thy father's house, yet wherefore hast thou stolen my gods?"

Jacob had listened in great irritation during the vainglorious speech of Laban, and as he concluded with the accusation of having stolen his gods his anger flashed forth and he exclaimed:

"With whomsoever thou findest thy gods, let him not live," for Jacob knew not that Rachel had stolen them.

Jacob's words reached the ears of Rachel as she sat within her tent, and as their awful import was realized she paled and her heart sank within her. With a cry to Jacob's God for help, for she felt instinctively that the gods she had concealed could not help her, she waited in terror while Laban searched through all the tents and at last came to hers, and while he peered into every nook and cranny she watched him with nervous apprehension. But he found them not, for they were concealed in the camel's furniture upon which she was sitting.

And Jacob was wroth and chode with Laban charging all the manifold wrongs which he had suffered at his hands, and with aggravating coolness Laban responded:

"These daughters are my daughters, and these children are my children, and these cattle are my cattle, and all that thou seest is mine; and what can I do this day unto these my daughters, or unto their children which they have borne? Now therefore come thou, let us make a covenant, I and thou; and let it be for a witness between me and thee."

And Jacob took a stone and set it up for a pillar, and commanded his brethren to gather stones, and according to the custom of the people they placed them in a circle about this central pillar upon which Jacob offered sacrifice, while Laban and his sons and the men with Jacob sat upon the stones in the circle. And then they all broke the bread of reconciliation. And Jacob called the place Galeed, for said Laban:

"This heap of stones is a witness between me and thee this day. And it shall be a watch tower between us, for the Lord shall watch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another. This heap and this pillar shall be a witness that I will not pass over this heap to thee, and that thou shalt not pass over this heap and this pillar unto me, for harm."

And for this reason was the place also called Mizpah.

SMITH NEVER DISSENTED.

Was Always Agreeable No Matter How Tall the Story Related to Him.

Sec Shaw and Senator "Tom" Carter, of Montana, were swapping stories, says the Brooklyn Eagle, when the secretary of the treasury told a good about an old man who lives down his own way. He never knows to disagree with a statement of another, no matter how improbable it might be.

"One day a group of fellows determined to see if they couldn't get Smith to disagree with them. Did you ever see a buffalo up a tree, Smith?"

"Well, I can't say that I have," returned Smith, regretfully.

"What," persisted the story-teller, "never saw a buffalo up a tree eating grapes?"

"Well, no, I never saw a buffalo up a tree, but," said Smith, brightening up, "I know they are very fond of grapes."

Addemup, who had taken a day off to attend the bookkeepers' picnic, was displaying his ability by climbing a tree. He fell in such a way that his feet caught in a fork of a tree, and there he hung head downward, ten feet from the ground. Railway Term Carried with It a Suspicion of Base Insinuation.

"It was in the Boston subway that this occurred," said a Providence business man, according to the Journal, and frequently journeyed to the Hub, "and I was an interested observer. I don't know whether you'd call it an accident, but I suppose the woman in the case regarded it as a tragedy.

"In alighting at that station near the Common, where I also happened to get off, a blundering, awkward hulk of a passenger who was all feet stepped on her, and made her skirt look as though it had been through a mangler.

"She was in a state of mind, of course, and no one could blame her; but the worst was yet to come. An alert official, notebook in hand, hurried up to her, anticipating trouble for the road.

"'Where did you board, madam?' he inquired.

"'Board!' she ejaculated indignantly, with a rising inflection, and speaking so that she could be heard above ground. 'I never boarded in my life.'"

Tired, Nervous Mothers

Make Unhappy Homes—Their Condition Irritates Both Husband and Children—How Thousands of Mothers Have Been Saved From Nervous Prostration and Made Strong and Well.

Mrs. Chester Curry

Mrs. Chas. F. Brown

A nervous, irritable mother, often on the verge of hysterics, is unfit to care for children; it ruins a child's disposition and reacts upon herself. The trouble between children and their mothers too often is due to the fact that the mother has some female weakness, and she is entirely unfit to bear the strain upon her nerves that governing children involves; it is impossible for her to do anything calmly.

The ills of women act like a firebrand upon the nerves, consequently nine-tenths of the nervous prostration, nervous despondency, "the blues," sleeplessness, and nervous irritability of women arise from some derangement of the female organism.

Do you experience fits of depression with restlessness, alternating with extreme irritability? Are your spirits easily affected, so that one minute you laugh, and the next minute you feel like crying?

Do you feel something like a ball rising in your throat and threatening to choke you; all the senses perverted, morbidly sensitive to light and sound; pain in the ovaries, and especially between the shoulders; bearing down pains; nervous dyspepsia, and almost continually cross and snappy?

If so, your nerves are in a shattered condition, and you are threatened with nervous prostration.

Proof is monumental that nothing in the world is better for nervous prostration than Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound; thousands and thousands of women testify to this fact.

Ask Mrs. Pinkham's Advice—A Woman Best Understands a Woman's Ills.

Mrs. Chester Curry, Leader of the Ladies' Symphony Orchestra, 23 Saratoga Street, East Boston, Mass., writes:

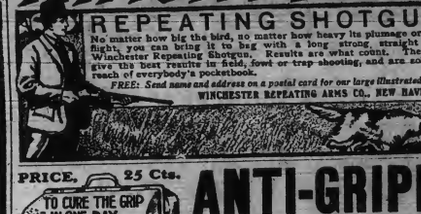
Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"For eight years I was troubled with extreme nervousness and hysteria, brought on by irregularities. I could neither enjoy life nor sleep nights; I was very irritable, nervous and despondent.

"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound was recommended and proved to be the only remedy that helped me. I have daily improved in health until I am now strong and well, and all nervousness has disappeared."

Mrs. Charles F. Brown, Vice-President of the Mothers' Club, 21 Cedar Terrace, Hot Springs, Ark., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—



"I dragged through nine years of miserable existence, worn out with pain and nervousness, until it seemed as though I should die. I then noticed a statement of a woman troubled as I was, and the wonderful results she derived from Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, I decided to try it. I did so, and at the end of three months I was a different woman. My nervousness was all gone. I was no longer irritable, and my husband fell in love with me all over again."

Women should remember that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the medicine that holds the record for the greatest number of actual cures of female ills, and take no substitute.

Suffered 23 Years from Constipation and Stomach Trouble

Wilbert Thompson never knew a well day—he had been constipated all his life—many doctors treated him, but all failed to even help him—his health failed rapidly and on January 21, 1903, Mrs. Thompson asked us to suggest a treatment for her husband. We thought the case too serious and recommended that a specialist be consulted—but he also failed to help the patient—NOW HE IS WELL.

MR. and MRS. WILBERT THOMPSON, 801 Main St., Peoria, Ill: MULL'S GRAPE TONIC CURED HIM.

Mull's Grape Tonic Cured Him

Mrs. Thompson first wrote us as follows: "My husband, aged 23, suffers from sharp pains in his stomach and sometimes thinks it is his heart. Let me know by return mail what causes the pain, if you can. Mr. Thompson has been treated by several doctors, but they have given him up."

We promptly advised that a first-class specialist be consulted. We quote: "We want to tell Mull's Grape Tonic, because we know it will cure constipation, but Sec. a bottle is no object to us when a human life is at stake, and if your husband's case is as serious as you state, we suggest you consult a reliable specialist, not the advertising kind, promptly." At the same time, knowing that Mull's Grape Tonic could do no harm, we advised its use until a physician could be consulted. January 25th, Mrs. Thompson wrote that a physician had been consulted. He diagnosed the case as being chronic constipation and dyspepsia. His treatment was followed faithfully, but there was no perceptible improvement in Mr. Thompson's health. Then he began taking Mull's Grape Tonic and on September 3, 1903, we received the following letter from Mrs. Thompson:

"You will remember that I wrote to you last January in regard to my husband's health. It is four months since he quit taking Mull's Grape Tonic for constipation, which he suffered from since birth. He took just 24 bottles of it and is perfectly cured. He is much stronger and has gained considerably in flesh. I cannot thank you enough for Mull's Grape Tonic. "It is worth its weight in gold.' Just $12 cured him and he has spent hundreds of dollars with doctors who did him no good. It did all you claimed it would."

Very respectfully yours, MRS. W. H. THOMPSON, 801 Main St., Peoria, Ill.

Mr. Thompson stopped taking Mull's Grape Tonic in June, 1903. He has been completely cured and has taken no other medicine since that date. Almost two years and no return of the disease, should prove a permanent cure.

It Will Cure You--Begin Today

Free Turnpike Law.

In the event the proposition to have free turnpikes and gravel roads carries, the law provides as follows:

"If it shall appear that a majority of all the votes cast for and against said proposition are in favor of said proposition, then the fiscal court may acquire by gift, lease, purchase or contract any or all of the turnpike roads, or parts of such as be within the county, on the best terms consistent with public interest, in the discretion of said court, and may provide for the construction of new turnpikes or gravel roads when the public demands it. Said fiscal court may levy a tax from year to year on all the estate of every kind assessed for state and county purposes, not to exceed in any year 25 cents on the $100 of taxable property for the purpose of paying for and maintaining such roads as may be acquired under this act and keeping them in repairs.

"The fiscal court shall have the power and authority to issue and sell bonds from time to time within the constitutional limitations for the purpose of purchasing and maintaining the roads so acquired or constructed under this act, said bonds to bear interest not to exceed 6 per cent per annum with coupons attached, payable semiannually; these bonds to be in denominations of not less than $100 or more than $1,000, to run not more than 30 years, and to be redeemed within that time at the pleasure of the court and to be sold at not less than par value. But before the bonds authorized under this act shall be issued, the fiscal court of the county shall by an order entered of record call an election to be held and direct a poll to be opened at the next county or regular election to be held in the county, which does not occur within 60 days from the date of the order calling said election. It shall be the duty of said fiscal court to direct the sheriff of the county to advertise said election and the object thereof for at least 30 days next before the day thereof in some newspaper having the largest circulation in the county and also by printed hand bills posted up at not less than four public places in each voting precinct in the county, and at the court house door. All legal voters in said county shall be privileged to vote at said election. The same officers that hold the regular election shall hold this election, which shall in all respects be held in accordance with the general election laws of this state, the question: 'Are you in favor of issuing bonds for the purchase and maintenance of the turnpike roads of this county free of toll to the traveling public?' If two-thirds of the legal voters voting on said proposition vote in favor of the proposition, then the fiscal court shall issue bonds as provided herein. The question of issuing bonds may be submitted to the voters at the same time that the question to have free turnpikes and gravel roads is submitted, or it may be submitted at another time."

In the event the owners of a turnpike and the fiscal court cannot agree as to its value, three commissioners shall be appointed by the county judge to ascertain its value:

"It shall be the duty of said commissioners to view the road to be taken, and require the owner or owners thereof to produce the books or other evidences, the receipts and expenditures on the road or part of the road to be sold, amount of net earnings for said turnpike road company for each year for the past six years, and they shall hear any and all evidence conducing to show the value of the property sought to be taken, and shall award to the owner or owners thereof, the actual value of the property taken in said county."

Judge J. E. Cantrill has notified Chief Justice J. P. Hobson that he will be unable to sit with the Court of Appeals during the September term. Why Judge Cantrill does not resign his seat on the Appellate bench is a puzzle to the people. He has no right to delay the work of the court of which he is a member. By the way, has the Judge notified the proper authorities that he is not able to draw his salary as Judge of the Court of Appeals?

The Georgetown News and Democrat came out on time last week, notwithstanding their office was about destroyed by fire the week before.

For Free Turnpikes.

"What do Free Turnpikes mean?"

Your correspondent says, "an unjust act," without stating why.

I will grant that perhaps they might mean an injustice to a few, but all laws are made for the benefit of the many.

As to the injustice let us consider for a moment who built the turnpikes of Boone county. Were they not built by the enterprising citizens of years ago, who gave their money as a free gift for the benefit of the public? but few of them or their descendants have any interest in them today, and many of them have paid their original subscription several times over in toll.

On the other hand the controling interests of the best paying roads have been bought in by shrewd business men and run by them in their individual interests and not always in the interest of the traveling public, while other roads, not more than self-sustaining, are left to be kept up by those who built them or by a few enterprising citizens whilst others, equally interested, deriving the same benefits will do nothing.

This, I consider, an injustice, but were the roads in the hands of the county each would have to pay the same tax, which would be just.

Now, I would appeal to the voters of Boone county as to which is the greater injustice—to allow the few to run them in the interest of the few or the many to legally acquire them and run them in the interest of the many?

As to the double increase of the tax on farmers, I am not sufficiently conversant with the law to meet that proposition, but be that a fact, it would in a few years create a fund sufficient to pike every road in the county, which would be a consummation most devoutly to be wished; but, allowing the increase, two thirds of the farmers will save enough toll to pay their tax and many of the remaining one-third are large land owners, some of whom are non-residents, who rent their farms, and the land lying nearest a pike rents for a higher price and necessarily the tenant pays toll, thus practically paying both tax and toll, the land lord paying neither, which is unquestionably a tax on enterprise.

As to the poor man who has nothing to sell but his labor, I do not see where it affects him at all, for under present conditions of business he is reasonably sure of fair compensation for his services, whether in wages or share of the crop.

As to the teamsters and hucksters, I can not see how they are affected by the road question, for all such things are governed by the law of supply and demand, and that is an issue not worthy of consideration.

If taking off toll would bring outside buyers, it would be an advantage to the farmers, for competition is the life of trade.

Pleasure seekers are supposed to be able to pay their way, whether it be toll or tax and are not to be considered.

Now, Mr. Editor, having to the best of my ability met every assertion made by your correspondent, Mr. Hall (he made no argument), I would like, with your permission, to advance a few ideas of my own.

First, I would respectfully request the voters of Boone county to make it their business to find out for themselves whether the change from toll to free turnpikes, as tried by other counties, has wrought the hardships represented by the correspondent, as there are a good many counties in the State that have been trying the experiment long enough to be qualified to give reliable information.

I have traveled some through several of these counties and made inquiries concerning this matter, but found no such conditions existing as described. On the contrary, as far as I could learn, there was universal satisfaction.

Again, I would request the RECORDER to publish the text of the law under which the county is authorized to act, so that all may know what the provisions are and vote intelligently.

Now, Fellow-citizens, this is a live question worthy of your careful consideration. It is not a partisan question, but one in which every permanent resident should be vitally interested, and I believe it to be a question that will bear investigation and discussion, and if properly understood, will be carried by a large majority to the future betterment of Boone county.

Very Truly Yours,
FRANK RUSSELL

Foeinst Free Turnpikes.

VERONA, KY., Sept. 6, 1905.

Go back with me through the cycles of the ages to the beginning of historic man, when mother Eve, in the beautiful garden of Eden, made the first mistake of the human kind. There Eve enticed, there Adam fell, and man has been falling ever since. Falling in love, some with the fairest creatures of creation; some with principles the foundation of right living; some with that thing which Shakespear mentions when he says, "He who steals my purse steals trash," and I am inclined to believe that 99 out of every 100, who favor free turnpikes are in love with the latter. Show me a man who favors free turnpikes and I will show you a man who will give a reason therefor, and the reason he gives is, almost, invariably a cloak to hide the real cause. It is only the sheep's clothing which he uses to hide the kind of biped, misnamed a man, from the condemnation of real mankind; but his clothing is threadbare, his deformity is easily seen, the bumps on his heart plainly say, "I favor free turnpikes because my tax will be less than my toll."

A man carrying a free turnpike petition asked me to sign it. The above argument was his stock in trade, the only one he was able to produce.

I object to free turnpikes because I know that any public improvement costs more than the same work does when done by an individual or corporation. I object to them because they would place an indebtedness on the county of from $40,000 to $50,000. I object to them because the pikes would not be kept in as good condition as they are now. I object to them because the burden will fall upon a large proportion of the people who would receive but little or no benefit therefrom. The tax on property would be augmented, the number of days work on the public roads would be increased, and all for the benefit of the man who lives on or near the pike.

The principle is absolutely wrong. "Let the man who dances pay the fiddler." If I meet a man upon the highway and take from him his purse, I am justly called a criminal, but if I can out vote a man and take his money to defray my expenses I am not called a criminal, but a public spirited man. Verily, a "rose by anyother name would smell as sweet." This public spirited man is found in all professions. The hay merchant, the doctor, the huckster, the standart oil octopus and the man whose riding is large and his taxes small. He can be found on the race course, in the dancing pavilion, and he sometimes sits far up in the pews in the house of God, his physiognomy rivaling Jacob's ladder. The sanctimonious rays sent out from his elongated countenance envelope, permeate and supplie the holy Bible with sanctity. This public spirited man's interpretation of the holy writing says:

"Take a man's coat and his cloak also. Do evil unto those who use you well. Do unto others as you would have no man do unto you. Let your light so shine that you may see to appropriate a part of your neighbor's purse to defraying ones expenses. Our God, which art in my pocket, hallowed by thy name, thy fullness come if my will be done on earth. I would give you this day my neighbor's change and relieve you of your debts, and make others pay the same. Lead us not into your depletion, but deliver us from toll, for thine art my kingdom, my power, my glory for ever. Amen."

And some of these claim to be followers of the lowly Nazarine. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

If we are forced to help buy the pikes for the benefit of the turnpike section, they should help build pikes for us. If the present law cannot be construed to build new pikes, it should be amended.

I will say in conclusion, for the benefit of the turnpike men, that there is some of the public spirited class in this section, provided the desired construction can be placed on the law, namely: To build new pikes as well as buy the old ones. They will vote for the law if you will convince them that the law forces them to tickle you, but forces you to tickle them more.

The whole thing is wrong—it would be injurious to a large majority of the people by placing an indebtedness upon the county which would be, probably, an everlasting inheritance upon generations yet unborn. LOWTAX.

Every man owes every other man a happy face.

ANOTHER GOOD MAN GONE.

OWEN PERRY CONNER.

Owen P. Conner, whose critical illness was mentioned in these columns last week, died at 2:30 o'clock Monday morning. He was born March 11th, 1849, and was a son of Louis and Jemima Ayler Conner, being a member of one of the county's oldest and most worthy families, his grand father, Lewis Conner, being a noted Baptist divine in this county back in the early forties.

On May 18, 1869, Mr. Conner and Miss Ada Alice Carpenter were married. To them were born one son and three daughters, all of whom are living: Albert Conner, Mrs. Robert Carver, Mrs. J. E. Rouse, of Scott county, and Mrs. J. L. McAtee, of Ludlow. Besides these children, and 11 grand children, his venerable mother, wife and three brothers, W. M., J. M. and Rev. C. C. Conner, survive him. Mr. Conner was a firm believer of the ultimate universal salvation of mankind, and was a member and trustee of the Burlington Universalist church, in which his funeral services were conducted at 2:30 p. m., yesterday by Rev. S. G. Ayers, of Cincinnati, who delivered a very able and consoling discourse, in the presence of a very large concourse of grief-stricken relatives and sorrowing friends, after which the remains were taken to the Odd-Fellows' cemetery near town and interred in the family lot. The pallbearers were John M. Lassing, Jas. A. Duncan, R. W. Adams, Minnie Hogan, N. E. Riddell, W. L. Riddell. The floral offerings were beautiful.

The early life of Mr. Conner was spent on the farm assigning himself to the duties incident thereon. After reaching the age of majority he engaged in farming and stock raising on his own account, achieving a success that ranked him one of the most prosperous planters of Boone County. During the year 1887 he began handling leaf tobacco, and since then he had been one of the leading buyers of this section of Kentucky, handling annually some 200,000 lbs. Dealing in tobacco so extensively, however, does not signify that he had discontinued farming. Four miles south of Burlington is located his farm of 223 acres, one of the most desirable estates in the county, and which has been under the control of his son Albert, since Mr. Conner became a citizen of Burlington, about five years ago, where he was comfortably situated in the most inviting homes about the town, just such a home as would be selected by a person in which to spend a retired live, which Mr. Conner, by his industry and good business methods, had earned. This home he had occupied about one year when he was called hence, to realize, it is hoped, the beautiful hereafter in which he believed.

As a business man Owen Conner was of inestimable worth to this county, and was ever courteous, kind and obliging, and his warm friends were limited only by the circle of his acquaintance. In every walk of life Owen Conner will be missed by this community, where his bright and cheerful disposition was an inspiration to all with whom he associated. The sudden departure of this kind and loving husband and father and obliging neighbor, casts a gloom over this town and surrounding country which time only can lift.

At his home with his family, his neighbors, and his people he was an inspirer of happiness, ever ready to extend freindship and assist his fellow man. Long will the people of this town and surrounding country fondly cherish his memory. There and here his genial company will be missed for all time, and while the neighborhood he loved mourns his loss, we must not forget that his loving wife and children have sustained an irreparable one; and while we deeply sympathize with them in this, their hour of bereavement, we pray that, "He who doeth all things for the best" will strengthen and comfort them in a full realization of the Creator.

Home Run—Downey. Struck Out—By Conner, 6; by Downey, 7. Left on Bases—Boones, 8; Belleview, 7. Umpires—Hogan and Rogers.

The following grew out of the Boone-Walton game of ball here on the 9th inst., and was submitted to the Base Ball Editor of the Cincinnati Enquirer for an opinion, and the following is a copy of the record in the case:

"The umpire decided that the batsmen was not out on the following play: 'The batsman made his third strike, and turned and walked about ten feet toward the players bench, thinking the catcher had caught the the ball, when he found that the ball had not been caught, but, had passed the catcher, he then turned and ran to first base, no attempt was made to throw him out. The claim was made that, because he turned and walked away from the plate he had abandoned his right to make the base and for that reason he was out. Was or not the decision of the umpire correct?"

The following is the decision of the Base Ball Editor of the Enquirer:

"Dear Sir:—The decision of the umpire was correct. The rule about a base-runner going out of line applies only to a runner who does so in order to avoid being touched by the ball in the hands of a fielder. In the case to which you refer, the batter only handicapped himself by walking ten feet out of the line, and he could not be called out for that reason. He was clearly safe, as he reached first base ahead of the ball."

Yours truly, JACK RYDER,
Base Ball Editor.

This is to certify that the game of ball played at Bellevue, Sept. 15th, between the Boones and Bellevue teams is not one of the championship series of 1905.

St. Catherine's lighthouse, Isle of Wight, has just been fitted with a flashlight which is estimated to be equal to 15,000,000 candle-power.

In some of the cities of Spain beggars are licensed to carry on their trade. Recent figures place the number of beggars in that country at 190,227, of whom 51,948 are women.

Though an attempt was made two years ago to abolish bows and arrows as the national weapons of China, the work has only been accomplished within the last few weeks. The imperial archers have existed up to the time the royal edict put them out of business about a month ago.

Six live Japanese mice arrived at Wilkesbarre, Pa., from Nagasaki, Japan, having traveled the entire 10,000 miles in a large vase in the center of a crate of chinaware. They had managed to get into the crate before it was sealed to eat the rice straw in which the ware was packed, and they remained in it, living on the rice straw, and arriving rather thin, but full of life and thirst.

The pay of the firemen of New York is not small. Charles Scott Pugsley, of Philadelphia, returned recently from the strangest vacation trip in the annals of outings—having spent ten days on an iceberg in the North Atlantic, and almost perished from heat and cold. Despite the terrible discomforts and hardships he suffered Pugsley is rejoicing, for by his act in camping ten days on the ice he won a bet of $20 from Walter Stevenson, the wealthy young Philadelphia broker, besides the expenses of his outing.

John Jacob Astor has lately told the world that the farmer has a new friend in the automobile. The farmer whose horses have plowed all day, and who, with his family, naturally needs recreation when the work is done, will, thinks Mr. Astor, invoke his automobile, that, as a stationary engine, may have been cutting feed, sawing wood or what not, switch the motive power to the driving wheels, and, with a joyful "All aboard," be off to the nearest town, though it may be miles away.

Because its chief of police is a minister of the Gospel, with appointments to fill the pulpit of a Congregational church, the saloons of Kansas City, Kan., the largest city in the sunflower state, run wide open every Sunday, in violation of the prohibitory liquor law, Rev. Vernon J. Rose, the chief of police referred to, is now fighting a movement to oust him from office and to select some man who has no ministerial duties to take up the time for which the city would pay him.

The Italian gambler's horror of the number proceeds, apparently, from the fact that a 13th card of one of his packs bears the figure of death. In England the superstition that one of a company of 13 must die within the year is traced to the old calculation of the insurance offices that out of 13 persons, taken indiscriminately, one will die within 12 months. Others trace the awe in which the figures are held to the Last Supper, at which 13 were present.

An appearance of a new island in the Japanese seas calls to mind other rapid risings of land in the ocean. An island suddenly came to light off the coast of Sicily, remained for two months and as quickly disappeared. Sabrina, near the Azores, retired from public life before it was fairly charted. The Gulf of Mexico has witnessed the advent and subsidence of small islands. These upheavals of the bed of the ocean suggest all sorts of mysteries connected with the unknown depths.

Director North, of the Census Bureau, plans to ask congress at the outset of the session for an appropriation to enable the taking of the marriage and divorce census. Collection of this data was authorized by congress last session, but no money was set apart therefor. The bureau is rapidly going ahead with the manufacturing census and will get this completed in a few months, so that as soon as an appropriation can be had there will be nothing to hinder the marriage and divorce census.

The phenomena of somnambulism, the marvelous performances of people who are asleep and yet able to go about, have never been understood by scientists. Often a somnambulist will accomplish feats which would baffle his skill or for which he would not have the courage while awake. He will rise in the night, walk from room to room, climb out on porticos, in some cases on steep roofs, where he would not dare to venture while awake, and frequently will wander for hours through streets and fields, and return, his home and to bed.

A MODUS VIVENDI.

A Compromise Reached By Sweden and Norway.

It Is Reported in Stockholm That All the Frontier Fortresses Except That of Kongsvinger Will Be Dismantled.

Karlstad, Sept. 18.—The first official announcement that the delegates of Norway and Sweden were approaching an understanding to establish a modus vivendi for the countries as separate governments was given out at the close of the joint session of the delegates. This announcement reads:

"The probabilities are that in the near future the negotiations can be brought to a definite result."

Christiana, Sept. 18.—Peace between Sweden and Norway being assured, a quieter feeling prevails here. News from Karlstad, however, is still awaited with the keenest interest and there is anxiety to learn the details of the compromise. The press is unnanimous in hoping for a speedy settlement of the questions. There are some misgivings entertained that peace may have been bought too dearly, but all the newspapers express relief that peace has been secured providing it is on an enduring basis.

Stockholm, Sept. 18.—Nothing is known here regarding the details of the compromise reached by the Swedish and Norwegian commissioners at Karlstad, but it is reported that all the frontier fortresses except that of Kongsvinger will be dismantled. The newspapers echo the public expressions of satisfaction over the report that a compromise has been arranged.

A HEAVY RAINFALL.

Eastern Kansas and Western Missouri Damaged by Floods.

Topeka, Kan., Sept. 18.—The flood situation here is serious. The levees protecting the farming lands along Soldier creek have broken and thousands of acres of cornfields are under water. A wagon bridge across Soldier creek went out at 4 o'clock, carrying eight boys and a horse and buggy down with it. Seven of the boys have been rescued, but one is still reported missing. The horse was drowned.

Kansas City, Mo., Sept. 18.—Heavy rains still continue in Western Missouri, forcing up streams and causing much damage to railroads and other property. Carrollton is experiencing the worst flood since 1888. At that place seven inches of water has fallen in the last 24 hours and 11 inches since Thursday. Wakenda creek is on the rampage and Carrollton is cut off from the Wabash depot, except by boat, and all residents in the lowlands are moving out and the Standard oil works, the city waterworks and the electric light plant may have to shut down. The water is rising at the rate of four inches an hour.

The damage to crops in the Wakenda and Turkey creek bottom is already heavy. Six inches of rain has fallen at Marshall since Saturday and the Salt Fork river near that city is more than a mile wide. The Missouri Pacific tracks are flooded for a considerable distance and much of the track has been washed away.

A Missouri Pacific steel bridge 130 feet long over the Lamine river at Otterville went out Sunday and traffic on the eastern division of the main line will be impeded for a day or so.

YELLOW FEVER REPORT

Only 24 New Cases and Two Deaths at New Orleans Sunday.

New Orleans, Sept. 18.—Official report to 6 p. m. Sunday: New cases, 24; total to date, 2,571; deaths, 2; total, 335; new foci, 6; under treatment, 323; cases discharged, 1,913.

The Sunday reports are usually lighter than the week day reports, but it was not expected that the report would run as low as it did. This leads to the hope that the reports this week will be much lighter than they were last week. The heavy report last week is attributed to the fact that every ten or twelve days there is a marked increase in the number of new cases showing a recrudescence of fever from cases not originally known.

Two cases were reported from the charity hospital, which came from Starder, La., which is in Tangipahoa parish, just across the lake from New Orleans.

SECRETARY TAFT AND PARTY.

They Sailed From Yokohama For San Francisco on the Steamer Korea.

Secretary Taft was given a reception at the American consulate by local merchants. Before sailing Secretary Taft said he thought that reports of the Japanese antipeace demonstrations has been greatly exaggerated in America. He and his party had travelled all through Japan and had found no trace of any anti-foreign or anti-American feeling.

IMPORTANT FACTS FOR COW OWNERS

The mechanical Cream Separator has become a vital feature of every home dairy just as of every butter factory.

Its use means much more and much better cream and butter, a great saving of water, ice, time and room.

The difference in results is not small but big. Few cows now pay without a separator. Dairying is the most profitable kind of farming with one.

98% of the creamery butter of the world is now made with De Laval machines, and there are over 800,000 farm users besides.

NOBILITY NOTES.

Princess Irene, wife of Prince Henry of Prussia, was christened as a child at the close of the war in 1866. Irene means "peace."

Recent pictures of the czar and the czarina indicate that both have aged within the last year. This, however, is more true of the czarina than of the czar.

King Alfonso has received one of the strangest gifts ever presented to a monarch. It is in the shape of two fine rugs made from the hides of the horses which were killed by the bomb thrown at the young Spanish king during his recent visit to France.

King Edward is an omnivorous newspaper reader, and on many occasions has shown himself to be a good friend of the press. He keeps a number of albums for clippings. GET POWER.

The Supply Comes from Food.

If we get power from food, why not strive to get all the power we can. That is only possible by use of skillfully selected food that exactly fits the requirements of the body.

Poor fuel makes a poor fire, and a poor fire is not a good steam producer.

"From not knowing how to select the right food to fit my needs, I suffered grievously for a long time from stomach troubles," writes a lady from a little town in Missouri.

"It seemed as if I would never be able to find out the sort of food that was best for me. Hardly anything that I could eat would stay on my stomach. Every attempt gave me heart-burn and filled my stomach with gas. I got thinner and thinner, until I literally became a living skeleton, and in time was compelled to keep to my bed.

"A few months ago I was persuaded to try Grape-Nuts food, and it had such good effect from the very beginning that I have kept up its use ever since. I was surprised at the ease with which I digested it. It proved to be just what I needed. All my unpleasant symptoms, the heart-burn, the inflated feeling which gave me so much pain disappeared. My weight gradually increased from 98 to 116 lbs., my figure rounded out, my strength came back, and I am now able to do my housework and enjoy it. The Grape Nuts food did it." A ten days' trial will show anyone some facts about food.

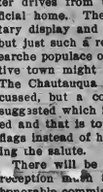
WASHINGTON GOSSIP

NATION'S CAPITAL A CHILLY PLACE TO HEROES.

A HISTORIC OLD TAVERN



Odd Bits of Information from Uttermost Parts of Earth in Present Consular Reports — The Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

WASHINGTON—The citizens of Washington, as a rule, are the most undemonstrative lot in the country. They are most phlegmatic in sentiment. It has been frequently remarked that noted men and heroes who have received the most enthusiastic receptions in other parts of the country have met with only a Chautauqua salute in the national capital. The cause of this seeming indifference undoubtedly lies in the fact that great men are as common in Washington as blackberries.

Despite this apathetic air the people of Washington propose to wake up and show the country that they are not indifferent to their own distinguished citizens, among whom they always claim the president of the United States. They now propose to give Mr. Roosevelt a fitting reception upon his return to the capital on September 30. They do not intend to have the garish display that other cities might get up for such an occasion, but the plan is to have the citizens assemble by the thousand along Pennsylvania avenue from the railroad station to the white house and applaud the president as the latter drives from the train to his official home. There will be no military display and no firing of cannon, but just such a reception as the rechearche populace of this ultra conservative town might be expected to give. The Chautauqua salute was first discussed, but a compromise has been suggested which is likely to be adopted and that is to use small American flags instead of handkerchiefs in waving the salute.

There will be no speeches at this reception much to the regret of the honorable commissioners who are gifted in this line. It is remembered that two years ago when a similar demonstration was gotten up to welcome the president home from a western tour, the official orators drew up before the executive as he alighted and prepared to deliver a formal speech of welcome. Mr. Roosevelt waved them aside, sprang into his carriage and at once entered upon the drive to the white house. There will be no wasted efforts on oratory this time.

The Prince at Newport.

THERE will be a gay old time at Newport the latter part of this month, or early in October, when Admiral Prince Louis of Battenburg with the second British North Atlantic squadron visits that noted resort. To have a member of a royal family and especially of the British royalty as a guest "in their midst" is a sensation that will bring the Newporters back to their summer haunts. The time of Prince Louis' visit will be after the regular Newport season closes, but arrangements are already being made to reopen some of the most fashionable and gay houses on the island. The royal guest will not want for entertainment and his staff of naval officers will be given a sample of genuine American hospitality.

Officials of the navy department will welcome all social attentions that can be accorded the British sailor men. They desire to have returned to the latter some of the courtesies that have been showered upon American officers abroad. To avoid an embarrassing contretemps, the ceremonies of reinterring the body of John Paul Jones have been postponed from this September 23 to April 24 of next year. The first date had been selected as it was the anniversary of the greatest exploit of the intrepid Jones when he whipped the Serapis with the Bon Homme Richard. Unfortunately this date would fall about the time Prince Louis visits this country and it might have been just a little embarrassing to him to have that little affair of the revolution recalled. The date next April is the anniversary of the captures of the British ship Drake by Commodore Jones and will answer just as well for the ceremonies.

Memento of George Washington.

ONE by one the old landmarks and historical places about Washington are removed or changed but one interesting old tavern seems destined to remain for some time as a memento of George Washington's time. An attempt was recently made to sell the historic building but no one appeared to bid what it was worth and it has been taken out of the market. This is an old frame building in West Washington, or what is better known as Georgetown, and is said by antiquarians to be what was once the famous Suter tavern. One hundred and fourteen years ago Suter was host to General Washington and Mr. Jefferson at this old building. The "Father of his Country" often refreshed himself at Suter's tavern when he was engaged in securing for the government the land that eventually became the District of Columbia. He spoke very highly of the food and drink to be obtained at the old hostelry.

Suter was a Scotchman and imported his whiskey directly from his native land. He got his rum from Jamaica and his brandy from the London docks. In spite of the ascetic look on Thomas Jefferson's face, the original democrat was a judge of good living and of good liquors. When he was minister to France he visited the celebrated wine vineyards of Europe and selected choice vintages for his own cellar in America. His tributes to old Suter was therefore worth something when he said: "No man on the Atlantic coast can bring out a better bottle of Madeira or sherry than old Suter."

Editor of the Consular Reports.

MAJOR JOHN M. CARSON, for over 30 years one of the best known of the corps of Washington correspondents, now at the head of the bureau of manufacturers, in the department of commerce and labor, has brought his old newspaper and editorial instincts into service in editing the daily consular reports which have become so valuable to the business world. Our consuls have developed the writing habit to a greater extent than formerly and are encouraged by the state department to send in reports on all matters of general business interest as well as the odd and interesting things they run across in their duties. Maj. Carson takes these reports and with a trained mind is able to extract from them the paragraphs that are of especial value to American readers. He has also changed the form of the daily publication so that it conforms to some extent with the daily newspaper in makeup, the arrangement of heads, subheads, etc. The pamphlet is still of the mailable size, 6x9, but it has been very much improved in typographical appearance and in the readable character of its contents.

Some queer bits of news come out in Maj. Carson's little publication. News from the uttermost parts of the earth appears and the land of mythology and ancient history is made to contribute to the daily melange. A recent contribution came from the far off land of Mesopotamia, a name that brings up Sunday school days and scriptural jaw breakers. We are informed by the correspondent from that land of dim history that great improvements are going on there, just as we might hear of developments in the wheat country of Canada.

Mr. Yerkes of Kentucky.

IF John W. Yerkes, commissioner of internal revenue, does not land in President Roosevelt's cabinet it will not be the fault of an army of good friends who are continually holding him up as the ideal man from the south for such a position. Mr. Yerkes is not bothering his head about any such preferment. He is eminently fitted for the place he now holds and has made an enviable record as the head of this most important bureau in the government service. He is one of the most affable men in the public service and it is the delight of his newspaper friends to gather in his office in the treasury building and listen to his fund of Kentucky stories which he tells in most charming and effective manner.

Mr. Yerkes is a Kentuckian and no son of that state, renowned for her fast horses, beautiful women and chivalrous men, is prouder of his birthright. He is a Kentucky republican of the most aristocratic class and of the type of Justice John M. Harlan, of the supreme court, who is known as Kentucky's "grand old man." Mr. Yerkes is a splendid type of the tall Kentuckian. He is a little over six feet in height, well proportioned and as straight as a pine. He is of ruddy countenance, has soft brown wavy hair and a sweeping dark red mustache. He attracts attention wherever he is seen by his carriage and distinguished air. He is well balanced intellectually and has a fine reputation as a lawyer.

The south has been claiming that she is entitled to representation in the cabinet and will not accept Secretary Bonaparte, of Maryland, as altogether filling the bill. She wants some one from the real south and the friends of Mr. Yerkes want to know why he will not meet requirements. President Roosevelt has a way of filling cabinet vacancies himself without much regard to what friends of available timber may say, and he has given no intimation that Mr. Yerkes has been in his mind for a place at his council table.

FACTIONAL FIGHT IN SIGHT

Great Opportunity for the Democracy to Attract Independent Voters.

The power of organization is shown in the control of the republican majority in congress by the protective tariff league. Those republican members of congress who are not stanch for the sacred tariff law, or even higher duties, are threatened with defeat and generally the brow-beating is so successful that the congressman obeys the imperative mandate of the league managers and complacently allows the people to be plundered by high trust prices for another term. The Economist, the organ of the league, has a good deal of responsibility on its hands in keeping all of the protection flock. Some of the lambs—the new members of congress—are inclined to flock with the tariff revisionists for they are in pretty close touch with the dear people and are anxiously looking for a renomination next spring. Then such old bucks as Senator Cullom and Gov. Cummins have strayed from the fold and have been guilty of addressing the Chicago Reciprocity conference. The bell weather—the Economist—says of that lapse of virtue:

"Other speeches of greater or less significance were delivered there, but none, we think, which so strikingly indicated the tendency to straggle and stray from sound party doctrine as the speeches of Messrs. Shelby M. Cullom and Albert B. Cummins. Here were two conspicuous republicans in attendance upon a distinctly anti-republican gathering and contributing their utmost toward the aims of that assemblage."

That is equivalent to reading those statesmen out of the communion and fellowship of the stand-patters, and it will be interesting to note if the league can force them back into the fold, or will succeed in defeating their political aspirations. Gov. Cummins has so often defied the league and been denounced by it that he finds just as good grazing outside of the league pasture as in it. But Senator Cullom has constantly kept within the party fold since the Fremont campaign and doubtless would not have mixed up with the revisionists unless he had arrived at the conclusion that the majority of the voters of Illinois favored tariff reform and that a majority of the republicans of that state are for reciprocity.

The league organ sees trouble ahead, but is prepared to fight it out on the ultra protection lines, and strongly hints that Senator Cullom and Gov. Cummins will be "put to sleep" politically by the aid of a cash provided by the trusts and corporations. For the Economist concludes by saying:

"You cannot pooh-pooh Cullom and Cummins. They are facts that will have to be recognized as such and dealt with accordingly. The method or dealing with these facts is obvious. The problem is to find out how much of Cullom-Cumminism there is inside of the republican party, and then what to do about it."

The threat is veiled, but it does not require much of an interpreter to read between the lines that the great protected interests which are plundering the public with their high prices have already determined "what to do about it."

This factional fight in the republican party will be made or fought out at the caucuses and conventions that nominate congressmen, and the sinews of war, provided by the trusts, will be enough to turn the scale against the tariff revisionists. If the protected interests are successful in thus defeating the reform element within the republican party, there will be a good many voters of that faith who will take to the woods, and there will be a percentage of independent voters who will throw their votes for the democratic candidates for congress.

Therefore the democrats must nominate its strongest candidates, especially in the doubtful districts, for there is where the fight for reform will be decided.

For a Dual Tariff.

The tariff reform meeting at Chicago was composed almost entirely of republicans. Resolutions were adopted, "recognizing the principle of protection as the established policy of our country, advocates reciprocal concessions by means of a dual or maximum and minimum tariff," and a committee was authorized to be appointed to establish a permanent organization under the style of the "American Reciprocal Tariff league." The democrats welcome all such efforts to aid them in relieving the people from the tariff that fosters trusts, but we warn those republicans that no relief from trust high prices can be expected unless they are prepared to greatly reduce or abolish the tariff on those trust products that are sold to foreigners cheaper than to our own people. A tariff that helps the people of other countries at the expense of our own is robbery.

——In the Philippines they are enthusiastic over the idea of Secretary Taft for president. It is probable that they make the mistake of thinking that it is the flesh rather than the spirit that holds down the lid.—Indianapolis News (Ind.).

——Secretary Taft shook hands with 3,000 in Manila. Observe that, Mr. Fairbanks!—N. Y. Commercial.

——"We are told," says the New Orleans Times-Democrat (Dem.), "that 'dual tariff' will be the war cry that will ring through the United States for some years to come. We prefer to believe differently. No such absurd way of tariff revision will recommend itself to so level-headed a people as those of the United States. No worse thing could happen to us than to adopt the plan of selling national favors as was proposed by the Chicago platform."

SCHEME OF DUAL TARIFF.

Merely a Sop Thrown to the Stand-Patters by the Republican Reformers.

The republicans who met at Chicago for the purpose of deciding upon a plan to reform the tariff evidently are not yet prepared to seriously break with the stand-patters. The decision to demand "a dual or maximum and minimum tariff" from congress is a useless concession to the protectionists, if anything is expected to be accomplished. It is merely a threat of reprisal against Germany and other countries who have raised their tariff wall against our products, and will hardly induce them to lower it. The only way to invite trade is to wipe out, at least some of the restrictions that the present tariff law imposes on the countries that would like to sell us their products and buy ours. The protectionist's idea of a maximum and minimum tariff is to make the present exorbitant tariff rates the minimum and add 25 or 50 per cent. to those rates for the maximum. That is what Secretary Shaw is reported to advocate, and Speaker Cannon, the Home Market club and the Protective Tariff league and their supporters probably agree with him. But as Secretary Blaine told McKinley when the tariff bill, known by his name, was incubating and proposing to increase the rates of duty: "Not a dollar of increased trade will be fostered by it," neither would there be by this proposed dual tariff, unless rates are reduced.

Every voter who detests the exclusion theory of the protectionists, which has fostered the trusts and their high prices, will, of course, rejoice that the protective tariff is attacked by "friends of protection," who have hitherto been silent participators in the wrongs committed. Gov. Cummins and those other representative republicans, as the great majority of the Chicago convention were, by their protest, will greatly help the cause of tariff reform, in drawing the attention of the people to the breakdown of the protection theory. They have recorded the fact that the American farmer and American industries can no longer depend exclusively upon the home market. That if our exports are not encouraged both our agriculturalists and our workmen will soon be unable to find a market for their surplus products except what England can buy, and as all countries are dumping their surplus products on the English markets, the price there is the lowest anywhere.

The republican majority in congress may "stand pat" and refuse to revise the tariff because the protected monopolies and trusts so liberally divide with the politicians and party managers a share of the plunder "to keep the boys in line," but when the protection shoe pinches a bit harder and farm products decline in price and wages decline, as they surely will, then the voters will arise to the occasion and there will be another revolt, as there was in 1884 and 1892.

The protectionists would gladly concede a dual tariff as long as they have the power to make the rates, but they have no intention of surrendering a particle of their private gain by the tax they levy on about all the people consume. There is only one thing that will ever move them, and that is the adverse votes of an outraged and plundered people, and until the reformers are prepared to elect tariff reformers to congress, how is it possible to expect relief. Gov. Cummins himself, doubtless voted for John A. T. Hull, who represents the Des Moines district, and who is an ardent stand-patter, and until he is ready to defeat Mr. Hull with some good honest tariff reformer, his work is useless. You cannot reform the republican party on the tariff issue as long as it gets part of the graft that the tariff supplies.

CURRENT PRESS COMMENT.

——If that Washington grand jury does not get tired, and the appropriation holds out, they will soon have the Wall street cotton exchange with but few brokers who have not been indicted for participation in the cotton scandal.

——It is now reported that the tobacco statistics have been juggled by the department of agriculture, to the great loss and damage of the tobacco growers and to the advantage of the tobacco trust. Farmer Wilson will have to wake up and protect his brother farmers, or the agricultural department will have to be known as "the trust and grafters' paradise.

——As Secretary Cortelyou has not resigned as chairman of the republican national committee, it is fair to presume that President Roosevelt still wants to keep his hand on the political throttle and dictate to his successor; or—how about that third term? It may be necessary for the president to accept a third term to keep the republican party in power; or to complete the Panama canal; or to wield the big stick and keep the nations in order; or because he and his office-holders think the country could hardly get along without them. Oh! there are a hundred reasons, and any one is good enough if the voters only think so.

——If that corrupt practice act is enforced in Connecticut, the old republican gang will hardly care to be candidates for the next legislature.

——The czar will now have to turn his attention to making peace with his own subjects. President Roosevelt might lend him a hand at that job, too, if the czar will let him get to work before he has a republican congress on his hands.

——Bermuda women are noted for their fine complexions. This is said to be partly due to the fact that they eat plentifully of onions.

Martin & Co., tobacco manufacturers, and alleging that the defendants are hopelessly insolvent. The plaintiff says the assets of the defendants amount to $105,500, which include $55,000 worth of tobacco in [illegible] and $32,000 worth of accounts. It is charged further that the defendants are in debt to the Western National bank, National Bank of Kentucky, First National bank, German Insurance bank and Third National bank to the extent of $187,000; to Hugh Martin for $12,000 and other creditors about $22,000, making a total alleged liabilities of $221,000.

A BIG DEAL.

Meat Business of the South To Be Controlled By the Armours.

Louisville, Ky., Sept. 16.—Armour & Co. have secured controlling interest in the big plant erected last year by the Kentucky Packing and Provision Co., and will immediately begin improvements involving the outlay of nearly half a million dollars. The deal means that Armour & Co. will practically dictate the pork output in the south. Louisville is made the distributing point of the entire south. Included in the deal is the sausage plant of the Kentucky company. Armour & Co. have been trying for many months to secure a controlling interest in the concern. It is understood that the purchase price is $250,000.

MYSTERIOUS SUICIDE.

W. W. Combs Drank Two Ounces of Laudanum.

Owensboro, Ky., Sept. 16.—A mysterious suicide in a hotel here was that of W. A. Combs, of Frankfort. He took two ounces of laudanum, evidently in small doses, a few minutes apart. Combs had been in Owensboro for a week. Papers found on him indicated that he stood high in fraternal orders. All the lodges to which he belonged are located in Frankfort. On a note Combs had written directing that his remains be sent to Monterey, Ky., and that the various lodges of which he was a member be notified.

THE TRIAL DELAYED.

The Main Witness in a Murder Case Failed To Report.

Paducah, Ky., Sept. 14.—The grand jury investigation of the murder case against H. H. Loving was delayed by the absence of V. J. Blow, a manufacturer of Louisville, and the main witness. He was served with a summons on a train. He did not appear. An attachment has been issued for him. This is one of the most important cases that was ever on the local court docket. Loving, it is alleged, killed H. A. Bose, a prominent lumber dealer. Loving is a banker.

Are After P. A. Sincere.

Owensboro, Ky., Sept. 15.—If the whereabouts of one P. A. Sincere are ascertained he will be brought to Owensboro and arraigned on charges of having obtained goods under false pretenses. It is alleged that in addition to carrying away a young woman's diamond ring he carried away a portion of her affections.

Plenty of Potatoes.

Louisville, Ky., Sept. 15.—The failure of the potato crop in the north will have no effect on the Louisville market this fall from the fact that the potato crop in Kentucky, and especially in Jefferson county, where great quantities are grown, is far above the average.

The Shiloh Commission.

Paducah, Ky., Sept. 14.—Maj. J. H. Ashcraft left for Cincinnati to attend the meeting of the National Shiloh Park commission. The other two members are Gen. Basil Duke, of Louisville, Ky., and Col. Cornelius Cadle, of Cincinnati, O.

Death Robs a Bride.

Dayton, Ky., Sept. 16.—Bernard Heeg, 27, died at the home of his father, George A. Heeg, 1018 Second avenue. Dropsy was the cause of his death. A sad feature of the death is that the young man was engaged to be married to a Miss Hallmeier.

Farm Brings Good Price.

Richmond, Ky., Sept. 16.—The John D. Haris farm, consisting of 1,300 acres, were sold at public auction. The old home place, containing [illegible] acres, was bought by C. Coy, of this county, for $122.10 per acre.

Got Off Cheap.

He may well think, he has got off cheap, who, after having contracted constipation or indigestion, is still able to perfectly restore his health. Nothing will do this but Dr. King's New Life Pills. A quick, pleasant, and certain cure for Sick Headache, constipation, etc. 25c at all drug stores, guaranteed.

Alfalfa and Corn Special.

The Alfalfa and Corn train that is to be run in this State for the benefit of the farmers will be at Walton, this county at 8:30 a. m. on the 27th inst.

Joseph E. Wing, of Ohio, will be the principal lecturer on Alfalfa, the most valuable forage crop in the world. It has been demonstrated that Alfalfa can be raised in a large portion of Kentucky and its introduction will mean much to the farmer. It is the most prolific yielder, one of the best soil enrichers and one of the richest foods known. Booklets with full directions for sowing, etc., will be distributed along the route free of charge. Every farmer should avail himself of the opportunity of hearing two of the most celebrated lecturers on agricultural subjects in the United States.

The Corn Department will be in charge of Prof. P. G. Holden, of Ames, Iowa, who last year increased the corn crop of Iowa, 10,000,000 bushels. Don't fail to hear him on the proper selection of Seed Corn and other phases of corn growing. Prof. Holden is one of the foremost agricultural experimenters in the United States. This is the first special ever run over the State in the direct interest of the farmers, and no farmer should miss the opportunity of hearing these celebrated men. Farmers' clubs are requested to attend in a body.

G. N. BUFFINGTON,
Buffington, Ky.

Gov. Hanly ousted from office David E. Sherrick, Auditor of the State of Indiana, charging that he had invested funds of the State aggregating $145,197.80, which he was unable to pay. Sherrick submitted to Gov. Hanly a schedule of assets amounting to $172,708.34, of which about $20,000 is on deposit in bank. Included in the schedule is $50,853.33 loaned to J. H. Murry & Co. on notes. Gov. Hanly declares these to be forgeries, but this is denied. The real value of Sherrick's assets, according to Gov. Hanly's analysis, is $37,355.01. Warren Bigler, of Wabash, was appointed successor to Sherrick.

NOTES.

The Harvest Home loses none of its old time popularity.

The premiums were not large, but they were just as eagerly sought for.

Good music was furnished for the dancers, and the young people kept it busy.

The light rain on Friday night was exactly what was needed to do away with the dust on Saturday.

Geo. C. Goode, of Covington, was there meeting his acquaintances in this county, and forming new ones.

The weather was delightful, the show was big and everybody for miles around was there. What more could the directors have asked.

Eight or ten of the white schools in this county are without teachers. The colored school has not secured a teacher yet.

It is just as well not to make merry over the woes of other people, and following is the experience of a western editor. He says: "While sitting at our desk relishing the above 'Tale of Woe,' a tall man with gray hair and elastic step entered the office and introduced himself as Murray Howard, of the St. Paul Milling company, and informed us that he had bought the building we occupy for our printing office and would use it for a flour mill and a feed store. There is not an empty building in town and we must get out or divide space with flour and feed. They are now unloading in on us, and we are feeling mad enough to vote the democratic ticket. If we have a 'bran' paper this week, or the editorial pageis 'floury,' or the local columns are 'short(s)' on news, you know the reason why. Verily, man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward."

F. T. Fall is figuring on the amount of coffee Uncle Mot Houston drank in 40 years, drinking 3 quarts each day. We hope to hear from Phillip, as we are too busy to undertake the problem just now. Please reduce it to barrels so it will be easier to enumerate.

Talk about your fish fries, barbacues, &c., but the chicken soup that Lee Busby can make eclipses anything in that line. Last Saturday he sent messengers to invite his friends to meet at his hospitable house and eat chicken soup with him, with instruction for the invited guests to invite their friends. The result was the entire neighborhood was invited and quite a large number responded, and was highly pleased with the entertainment, consisting of chicken soup with all the trimmings. To those who enjoyed a smoke was given a good Havana cigar, while candles and other delicacies were served to the satisfaction of all present. Some very beautiful music was rendered by the host, who is an expert with a violin, with a piano accompanied by Mrs. Susie Surface and Miss Lelia Floyd. Miss Beulah Surface favored the assembly with a beautiful vocal solo. At a late hour the crowd dispersed with a warm feeling for the host and hostess for their kind hospitality and generous entertainment.

Carl Bullock, of Union, one of the dead is isolated from the town of Petersburg by having neither a conforttable driveway nor side walk. I have conceived a plan of building, without the expenditure of any money, a gravel driveway 20 feet wide and one foot deep, and a side walk 6 feet wide, from Broadway to the south gate of the cemetery, a distance of about 2,300 feet. My plan is for those who take a pride and interest in the home of their departed friends and relatives, to contribute the work necessary to carry out my plan. I hope to begin the work on the 16th of October, and expect ten wagons to build the road in two weeks. I have mentioned the plan to several parties and have met with much encouragement. Mr. Earl Walton headed the list with a free donation of the use of himself and team for ten days. I hope that all who feel an interest in this matter will report to me how much work they are willing to contribute. If I see that there is a willing to do their part I will push it through.

Miss Pearl Crisler, one of the prettiest and best young ladies in the town and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Crisler, of the Riverside Hotel, was married last Wednesday at 2:30 p. m., in the presence of quite a number of friends of the bride and groom, to Mr. Lloyd McClamon, a popular and wealthy young farmer of Taylorsport. Miss Pearl was a model young lady, every ready to assist her parents in any of the duties of the household and was never found idle when there was any thing to do. We congratulate Mr. McClamon on securing such a noble specimen of womanhood to share down through this earthly pilgrimage, and in the language of the poet, "may their lives be as two souls with but a single thought, two hearts that beat as one."

The following is from the Grand Rapids Daily Herald: "A glance over the records made by the Grand Rapids players this season show that Podge Alloway, the veteran twirler, has split even on the season, with thirteen victories and thirteen defeats, despite the fact that he has been the most unfortunate pitcher on the team, in being worked on days that the team has been off in fielding and at times when the boys were not hitting. Included in his record is a no run no hit game in Canton and five games in which his opponents got but one run. One was a shut out and in five of the games his opponents only got two runs, making eleven games pitched in which but fifteen runs were scored. Nine runs is the most made off the veteran twirler's delivery in any game, and his work has been consistently high class except during one trip around the circuit when the Canadian boys were batting and were way off in fielding. The no hit no run game was against the Canton team when it had been winning right along, and it broke a long string of loses for Gansell's men. Alloway has always been a hard, willing worker and has got out on the line every day with pleasing coaching."

PETERSBURG.

Petersburg can boast of the most beautiful cemetery in the county. It is situated about 1,500 feet from the town limits, on the Belleview road and contains about four acres of land. Nearly all the available lots have been sold, and the trustees will have, in the near future, to enlarge its capacity. This beautiful city of the dead had been somewhat neglected in late years. Its fence had reached that dilapidated condition that it would hardly turn a cow, and a wild growth of weeds and briars had taken possession. The pride of the trustees, backed by about $400 in the treasury, prompted them to awaken to the necessities of the occasion, and expend some of this surplus in building a substantial and ornamental fence in front, and giving the lot a thorough cleaning up. Two double iron gates were purchased of the Stewart Iron Works, which give a decided finish to the beautiful fence in front. There are several handsome memorials erected over the graves. It has a beautiful octagonal vault with a domed roof of slate. A drive way through the cemetery circles around the vault from one gate to another. To the discredit of the citizens of Petersburg and those interested in the cemetery through the ownership of lots, I am sorry to say, the beautiful city of the dead is isolated from the town of Petersburg by having neither a conforttable driveway nor side walk. When it is dry the sand is shoe top deep, and when it is wet the slush is of the same depth. I have conceived a plan of building, without the expenditure of any money, a gravel driveway 20 feet wide and one foot deep, and a side walk 6 feet wide, from Broadway to the south gate of the cemetery, a distance of about 2,300 feet. A curious club has been formed by certain women of Berlin. The chief qualification for membership is that the applicant must be deaf. A hundred members meet weekly in Wilhelm strasse, where they drink tea as they converse in the sign language or with the aid of ear trumpets.

Hand grenades, which have been practically out of date for a century, have been employed by both sides in the Russo-Japanese war so extensively that it seems possible that their use and manipulation may enter into the general curriculum of the soldiers training in our own and other modern European armies. Time was when these deadly missiles were carried by a number of the biggest and strongest soldiers in every infantry regiment.

According to Mr. J. D. Dargan, president of an Atlanta, Ga., insurance company, the life insurance premiums collected in 12 southern states during the calendar year 1904 amounted to $50,856,067. The states here included are the Confederate States, the large sum paid in premiums, all but a little more than half a million was paid to northern companies. New York companies collected almost 60 per cent. of the total.

Tons of paper are used for building purposes every year. Garments made of paper, spun with cotton, are to be found on sale in every city in the land. Collars, cuffs and shirt bosoms, otherwise known as "dickeys," have long been worn at one-tenth the cost of linen. Bonnets and crepe paper hats are made for women. Under the act just passed by the Pennsylvania legislature for the annexation of Allegheny to Pittsburg the latter will become one of the country's great cities. The annexation idea will have to be ratified by a vote of the people of the two towns before it can become operative, but this assent seems assured. In 1900 Pittsburg had 321,616 inhabitants and Allegheny 129,896, a total of 451,512. The cities which had more than that number of people were New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston and Baltimore.

There is encouraging evidence that the lynching mania is dying out in the South under the pressure of public sentiment and the vigorous action of such men as Gov. Vardaman, of Mississippi. The year thus far has recorded fewer of these cases of mob violence than any similar period for a number of years. Repression of this form of violence and lawlessness will be further promoted by the action of the supreme court of Mississippi, in affirming the sentence of a white man to a life term in the penitentiary for assault upon a black girl.

Within a radius of one hundred and fifty miles from Los Angeles, Cal., more varieties of products from the soil are produced than any one could imagine. And a majority of the products yield handsome returns on the investment. Every year some new experiment is tried in the horticultural line in southern California, and it is only a question of time when the orange will be secondary in importance to some crop that will yield more with less outlay and less work. Experiments are now being made with pineapples.

The feat of writing the Lord's Prayer upon a space which a six-pence would cover is so familiar as to cease to be wonderful; but one can not resist a tribute of genuine astonishment to a man who can write the whole of the national anthem along the thin edge of an ordinary visiting card, and then add autograph biographies of the Danish king and several members of the Danish royal family on a grain of rice. Mr. Isaac Hill, of Bedford, Mass., calls himself the champion penman of the world, and we are inclined to agree with him.

A TALE OF LOVE AND PLAGIARISM

Stolen Love-Letters That Broke One Engagement and Made Another.

THE HEROINE A BALTIMORE SOCIETY BELLE

Her Lover Appropriated Tender Missives of a Friend to His Ultimate Sorrow—Disclosure Brings Happiness to Two.

Baltimore, Md.—This is a story of how a lover lost his sweetheart through his ardent, but plagiarized, love letters. Walter Aylette's sin found him out, but the disclosure brought happiness to his friend and roommate, Ferman Phillipps.

The principals in the remarkable and interesting love drama are Molly Entrekin, one of the belles of this city, her chum, Martha Baker, Walter Aylette, son of a prominent Richmond family high in society and reputed wealthy, and Ferman Phillipps, who although poor, comes from a distinguished line of ancestors.

Aylette, it is charged by the other three parties to the case, plagiarized the brilliant love epistles that Ferman Phillipps wrote in secret to Martha Baker and, by changing them slightly, came near winning the love of Miss Entrekin through them and their passionate force. The discovery was made but a few days before the wedding was to have taken place, and the girl with the glamour of the false spell dissipated, dismissed Aylette, declaring him an impostor and cheat.

Phillipps and Aylette were friends and lived in the same boarding house. Why Aylette should have been living in Baltimore in obscurity few outside of the friends who were aware of his wildness and dissipation at Richmond knew. He was a handsome fellow, dark, dashing and romantic. Phillips, on the other hand, was timid, and the gayeties that Aylette sought he shunned, or was too bashful to participate in.

Phillipps Meets His Fate.

Aylette was reading law in a downtown office and Phillipps was striving for a living in a prominent mercantile house. While all business, so far as even his closest friends know, he really was a dreamer, and he aspired to write novels and plays. He had come into Baltimore without resources and worked hard. By accident he was thrown into contact with Walter Aylette, and the result was a strange intertwining of fates. Aylette, through his family's prominence, had the entree to many homes, and one evening, by insistence, he persuaded Phillipps to accompany him to the home of Miss Molly Entrekin, daughter of a wealthy merchant. Aylette did not tell Phillipps, but he invited him to go merely that he might have another man to "take her chum off his hands" during the evening.

It was that evening Ferman Phillipps met his fate in the shape of pretty Martha Baker, Molly Entrekin's chum, who—if the truth were known—had been summoned by Molly when she knew Aylette's call was inevitable.

Molly's plan failed. Instead of helping her dispose of Aylette Martha appeared to enjoy herself talking to the young department manager, and Molly was forced to be gracious to the man who, at that time, she disliked, but to whom because of the family friendship she was obliged to be gracious.

Aylette Confesses Sordid Love.

The families of both girls are wealthy; and, going back to their rooms in the boarding house that night, Aylette confessed to Phillipps that he did not particularly love Miss Entrekin, but that she was rich and that he was going to win her. Disgusted, sickened by the attitude of his friend, which came as a rude awakening from the dreams that he himself had been dreaming, Phillipps turned to go to his room. There, with the vision of the bright-eyed, fair-haired girl before him, he resolved never again to go near her, realizing, as he thought, the impossibility of ever winning the love of Martha Baker. He held to his determination. Two or three times the girl inquired of Aylette why he never brought Mr. Phillipps with him to call, and she admitted to Miss Entrekin that she had been interested in the reserved, handsome young fellow. Once she frankly asked Aylette to bring Phillipps to call, but the message was never delivered, and Aylette lied about it to her, telling her Phillipps preferred not to come, and the girl, surprised and hurt, never referred to him again.

Phillips became more silent than ever and worked harder, refusing to join in any of the little pleasures of the others in the boarding house. Once one of the girls in the bouse teasingly asked him if he was in love, and he flushed and left the room.

Aylette, to all appearances, was making no better progress in his efforts to win the love of Miss Entrekin, and he departed for Richmond for a fortnight's vacation without receiving one sign of encouragement.

Beginning of Love Letters.

Then, suddenly, there began to come to Molly Entrekin, day after day, letters overflowing with tenderness, love, and passion; love letters such as swept the hearts of her grandmothers by storm—flowery, imaginative, beautiful love letters, such as girls read and reread in the privacy of their own rooms and grandmothers kiss when they find them hidden in the bottoms of old trunks. The letters were from Walter Aylette, and they revealed to Molly Entrekin a depth of feeling, of power and passion, of love and tenderness and yearning that she had never suspected existed in the man. She was astonished.

Three of the letters, which have been made semi-public by the events that followed, have been circulated among her friends—before the real truth was known.

The first came the day Walter Aylette reached Richmond.

"My Dear Miss Entrekin: I love you. I have said it; the words that have trembled on my lips since that first evening that I saw you, when my heart fell down and worshiped you. From afar I have worshiped you ever since, daring not come near, coward that I am, for fear the secret would burst from me; that the words that I dare not speak should speak themselves; that my whole heart would cry out to you: 'I love you.'

"I am writing these words that I never will dare say to you and that perhaps you never will see. Would that I dared send them to you, I, who am up my courage and dare all by telling you. I am trembling and quaking now at the thought of what you would think if you read this. I cannot help it; I must write. I dare not whisper my love to you. It were profanation to speak of it to others.

"Good-night, ——el. I have dared it even to myself."

Miss Molly Relents.

When Mollie Entrekin got that letter she sat down in the middle of the floor and read it. Then she said: "Well, of all things." Then she read it again. Then she said: "I never heard of such a thing." Then she reread it, and, clasping her arms around her knees, sat on the floor and studied.

"I don't know why he wrote me such a letter," she said to herself. "If the fool man is in love with me, why don't he tell me so? Don't dare to come near me, don't he? I've noticed that he's been hanging around here two or three nights a week."

Finally she got up and said: "Anyhow, I'll write him a nice letter that will cure him." And she wrote. It was a kind, sisterly letter, and the burden of it was: "Impossible; I don't love you."

But there was no doubt that the letter had started Molly Entrekin to thinking. She read it over and over. It partly impressed, partly puzzled her. It wasn't a bit like Aylette.

Three days later there came another astonishing missive.

That time Molly read seriously. Again the tone of the letter puzzled her, and she wondered if he had not received her rejection before writing, and thought it strange that he did not mention it.

"Men in love are such fools," said Molly, and, taking the two letters, she went over to see her dearest chum, Martha, and consult with her about it. Martha read the letters, and then she said: "Molly, if a man ever wrote to me that way I'd love him just in spite of myself."

"I'm afraid I'm beginning to like him," said Molly. "Maybe I misjudged him before." Then she wrote him a kinder, sweeter reply, telling him that she hardly knew her own heart—and to come to her the moment he returned from Richmond.

The following day there came another letter, tenderer, more exalted, higher in tone than the other, breathing the despair of an unloved lover exalted by the purity of his love.

And Molly was conquered. "I never did like the man," she said to Martha. "I am afraid I lost the beauty of his character through my blindness. I'm not sure I love him now, but I'm glad these letters have opened my eyes and shown me the depth of his love. Any girl can learn to love a man who loves her that way."

Engaged But Not Happy.

So that night Molly Entrekin, in her own boudoir, sat down and wrote her first love letter, and became engaged to Walter Aylette. For the first time in her gay, happy 19 years she looked seriously upon love. Yet she was surprised to find that she was not happy. She confessed to Martha that she was uneasy.

There was no announcement of the engagement. Two days after she accepted Aylette by mail there came from him another letter; so different that Molly's uneasiness grew great. It was a nice letter, overflowing with rejoicing—but there was something missing. Molly felt that her surrender, her gift of herself to the man who had seemed to despair, was not received in quite the manner she expected it. It seemed to her that the man was gloating rather than exalted by his victory.

All that night she was uneasy. She felt that she had made a mistake, and she read and reread the first three letters before she fell asleep, happy and reassured. The thought came to her that perhaps she loved the letters and not the man, but she did not believe that art could infuse such feeling into written words.

The next morning Molly came down to breakfast late. She looked a little wan and pale, a little anxious. It was the day that Aylette was to return to Baltimore; the day on which for the first time Molly was to surrender to the kisses of her lover. She was reading the paper idly while waiting for her coffee and orange when suddenly her eye fell upon a little "want ad." that made her gasp.

"I knew it; I knew it," she said, half aloud. "Oh, the wretches!"

"Knew what? What wretches, sis?" asked Bobbie.

"Never mind, Bobbie, but I want you to go on an important errand right away."

"All right; but say, sis, do I get some of that candy Nick sent up last night?"

"Yes, all of it. But I want you to take a note right away. It is important. Everything depends on it."

Suspicion Aroused by an Ad.

Excitedly Molly left the table, and going into the library scratched off a note.

"Mr. Ferman Phillipps: Please come to me at my home, at once, this morning. You must come before noon. It is an important matter, one on which my future happiness my depend.

"MOLLY ENTREKIN."

Phillipps, surprised, read the note and unmindful of Bobbie, rushed for a car. Twenty minutes later he was ushered into the morning room at the Entrekin residence.

"Mr. Phillipps," began Molly, nervously, "did you put this advertisement in the paper?"

She handed him the morning paper, in which appeared an ad.:

LOST.—A BUNDLE OF LETTERS, PURELY personal, of no value except to owner. A reward of $25 will be paid if returned to Ferman Phillipps, — N. Charles street.

"I did," said Phillipps, rather unsteadily, after he had read the ad. slowly.

"Are these the letters?" asked Molly, producing the three she had received from Aylette.

End of the Mystery.

"Why, Miss Entrekin," said Phillipps, excitedly, 'where did you get these? They are copies of mine, or part of them. I was sure they were stolen from a drawer in my room. How did you get them?"

"They were mailed to me by your roommate, Mr. Aylette," she answered, steadily. "I notice that in the first one my name was at the top, above the line. I thought it strange at the time."

"Aylette send my letters to you?" asked the astonished Phillipps. "Why should he do that?"

"He wanted to make me love him. He nearly succeeded. Oh, Mr. Phillipps, I am so ashamed and so glad. You have saved me from the wretch."

"Please don't," he urged, tenderly, as she started to cry. "Please don't. I am so sorry that I have helped cause this trouble."

"I'm not; I'm glad," said Molly, stopping her tears and flashing into anger. "I'll tell that man—" Then she broke off suddenly and turned upon the young man. "Ferman Phillipps," she demanded, "to whom did you write those love letters?"

Now [illegible] dictated. "Tell me [illegible] help you. You are in love with a girl and afraid to tell her so?"

"Please don't, please don't," pleaded the agonized Phillipps.

"I will, too," she said. "Here, I've told you everything and trusted you, and now you've got to trust me. Who is she?"

"Really, Miss Entrekin, I can't tell you. I scarcely know her, and it would be presumptuous for me even to speak to her."

"Do you love her?"

"Yes—you must know I do from the letters."

"Do you love her as much as those letters show?"

"More."

"I wouldn't give a cent for a man who wouldn't tell a girl when he loves her. Who is she?"

"Your friend, Miss Baker."

"What! Martha Baker? Oh, this is too good. It's almost as good as if it had been me, and I'm half sorry it wasn't. You come right over to Martha's house right now and tell her you love her. If you don't come with me now I'll send for her to come here. You've got to propose to her right away, and I'm going to stand by and see you do. And let me congratulate you now—for she has read those letters."

Phillipps finally begged off, but promised to call that night on Miss Baker, and he pledged his word to Molly Entrekin that he would propose before the end of the month. And Molly, as soon as she had refused to see Aylette when he called, rushed off to tell Martha, and they talked all afternoon and cried a little bit, as girls do.

Phillipps really proposed inside of two weeks and was accepted. And Molly showed the letters to every girl in their crowd, as she told the story, and one of them copied two of them—so the secret of the plagiarized letters became known to all Baltimore.

It is said that Aylette is now working in New York or Philadelphia, and Molly's engagement to Nick is expected any day, much to the delight of "Bobbie," who appreciates candy.

LEATHER MADE FROM PLANT

A Vegetable Product of Japan That Is in Demand for This Country.

The department of agriculture is trying to introduce into cultivation in this country a plant native to Japan, which furnishes a sort of vegetable leather. It is a pretty shrub called the "mitsumata," and its inner bark, after going through a process of maceration, is converted into a substance as tough as French kid, so translucent that one can almost see through it, and as pliable and soft as calfskin. In Japan pipe cases and tobacco pouches are manufactured from the material, as well as a kind of wall paper which is already becoming fashionable in America. Such wall papers of vegetable leather are turned out in beautiful designs for wall and ceiling decoration, being stamped and modeled by hand in most artistic patterns.

It would seem that we have a good deal to learn from the Japanese about paper making. Already we import large quantities of another kind of paper obtained from the same plant, for use as legal documents, diplomas, deeds and bonds. There are at least eight other plants from which the subjects of the mikado obtain paper stuff, while we depend for such material upon wood pulp and rags of cotton and linen.

Mr. David G. Fairchild, one of the government agricultural explorers, who has made a special study of this subject, says that it is not pleasant to think that the brilliant white note paper which a lady uses may have in it part of the filthy garment of some Egyptian fellah, saved by a ragpicker from a gutter, yet it is a fact that hundreds of tons of Egyptian rags are fetched every year to the United States to supply our paper mills. At Mannheim on the Rhine the American importers have ragpicking houses, where rags are collected from all over Europe (the disease infected Levant not excepted), and where women and children work with wet sponges tied over their mouths, sorting the filthy scraps for shipment to New York. Our best papers are made of these rags.

Paper made from the inner bark of plants, like the "mitsumata," are a creation of the orient. They are softer, slikier, tougher and lighter than our papers. If wet they lose their strength, like tissue paper, but on drying regain it. They are usually absorbent, and for this reason were highly valued for surgical purposes.

Wonders to Be Seen at Home.

Within very recent years the American people in general have been learning as they never did before the wonders of their own country. They went abroad for scenery and to view places of historical interest, unmindful that their own land contained spectacles unrivaled elsewhere and relics of a civilization that is prehistoric. Places that only a few years ago had hardly a visitor now attract many thousands annually. The Yellowstone park has become well known, so also the stupendous Yosemite, the imposing Sierras rising abruptly almost from the sea level to heights of nearly three miles. America abounds with miracles of nature, grandly impressive or marvelously beautiful.—Buffalo Courier.

A WHALING STATION

SPITZBERGEN MOST INTERESTING DURING THE SEASON.

Owned by No Country — Norway's Laws Regarding Whale Fishing —The Busy Scene Presented at the Bay.

The steam yacht Vectis is one of the few cruising yachts that included a call at that great whaling station, Spitzbergen, this year in its itinerary of a cruise to Norway and the North Cape. Although the passage there is not always attended with the most propitious weather—occasionally it is even impossible to enter Recherche bay of Ice fjord owing either to the dense fogs or ice floes that with some winds block the entrance—those who are fortunate enough to get in are well repaid for their trouble. Spitzbergen comprises two principal islands, separated by Hinlopen strait, and a great number of smaller islands. The northeast land is imperfectly known and seldom visited, for it is surrounded by a girdle of ice but rarely broken. The west land is accessible every year from the beginning of July to the end of September. Although Spitzbergen is owned by no country, the English have a house situated in Ice fjord (Advent bay), Germany has one in Hornsund, and the Norwegian government has just acquired one from some trappers, who built it last year and who wintered there on Anel island in Bell sound. Owing to the laws lately passed in Norway prohibiting whale fishing on the coast, the Norwegian whaling fleet has now made Recherche bay their headquarters, although their appliances for dealing with all the carcases are at the moment insufficient. As this season has been a very good one, the bay presented a busy scene, which added a further interest to its wonderful glaciers and natural grandeur. Each blue whale's carcass yields about 70 barrels of oil, value $1,050, and a certain amount of the bone is also of value. The sperm whale, from which the best bone is obtained, and from the head of which alone almost as much oil as can be obtained from a blue whale is extracted, is fast becoming rare. The men employed are not very well paid; they make about $300 per season, but few can stand more than two seasons in succession.

The glaciers in Recherche bay are its most noted feature. The east glacier is one and a half miles wide and 100 feet high at its face; the continuous falling of enormous masses of ice makes it exceedingly dangerous to approach closely. As these masses break away wonderful crevasses of the most beautiful shades of blue are revealed.

The Fox glacier is about one mile broad, its lateral moraine being 150 to 200 feet in height.

Large numbers of fulmar petrel infest the bay, gorging themselves on the carcases of the whales which are cut adrift when done with and being almost unable to get out of the way at anyone's approach.

Remarkable Metal.

Although the existence of tantalum, the new material employed for incandescent lamp filaments, has been known for 100 years, it is only very recently that the metal has been prepared in a pure state, says Youth's Companion. This is effected with the aid of the electric furnace. Tantalum combines extreme ductility with extraordinary hardness. When red-hot it is easily rolled into sheets or drawn into wire, but upon being heated a second time, and then hammered, it becomes so hard that it has been found impossible, with a diamond drill, to bore a hole through a sheet only one millimeter thick. Such a drill, working day and night for three days, at 5,000 revolutions per minute, made a depression only a quarter of a millimeter deep, and the diamond point was badly worn.

Music Pupil's Handicaps.

A certain teacher of music in a New England town never allows a chance of self-glorification to escape him. One of his pupils, a blind young cripple, recently passed a stiff examination, and the delighted music master rushed to the editor of the local paper with the fact.

He was sorry he did, however, when this paragraph appeared in the journal:

"Our young townsman, who, besides being blind, has lost the use of his legs, was prepared for this examination by Mr. B—, a local teacher of music. Yet, despite all these handicaps he came out of the ordeal with flying colors."—Chicago Tribune.

Plans are being made by Lexington business men to secure an appropriation from the Legislature to establish a permanent fair in that city. Many legislators are said to favor the plan.

A temperance revival is sweeping over Barth, Nicholas, Fleming, Lewis, Rowan, Greenup, Carter, Morgan, Menifee, Estill and Breathitt counties. Booze has been bounced in these counties by popular vote.

The Kentucky Anti-tuberculosis Society has decided to treat patients in tents, and a large farm will be purchased immediately for that purpose. All patients who are physically able will be made to live in tents all the year.

The United States leads all other nations in the total consumption of tobacco, while Belgium stands at the head of the tobacco-consuming countries so far as the per capita consumption of the "fragrant weed" is concerned. Germany and Russia are the only other two countries besides the United States which show a total consumption of over 100,000,000 pounds.

While people of wealth have for years tended toward country homes, the thinking man of narrow means is now oftner looking through city smoke toward a few acres outside where he may carry on extensive farming, while his children may at least have pure air, pure sunshine, pure water and pure food, with the ennobling influences of nature. He dreads to have them grow up scarred and dwarfed with the idea that they are underlings, an idea slow to take root in the cordial, democratic surroundings of the country, where small means may be coupled with a manly, sturdy independence. He longs to be acquainted with his neighbors, and to have them know and care whether he has a wedding or a funeral at his house. He is tired of being a molecule in a mass; he would like to be as he should be—an individual man.

The instructions which the postoffice department has sent to Kentucky postmasters, requiring the numbering of the boxes on each of the rural routes running out of the respective cities and towns will result, according to a discovery just made, in a great advantage to the large mail order houses. Where a mail order house uses the circular method of advertising it can address a letter to "Mail Box No. 1, Route No. 1," and the carrier will have to deliver it. All that the mail order houses will have to do will be to learn the number of routes in a county and the number of boxes on a route. No attention need be paid to the names of the rural citizens living on the routes because a letter addressed to his number will reach him just the same as if his name had been written on the envelope. It is not the purpose of the government to foster the business of mail order houses, but it is not known yet what steps will be taken in view of the discovery just made.

For some time there has been a growing demand for good ewes for breeding purposes. As stated by one of our correspondents the increased demand and price of sheep have greatly increased the inclination to breed more sheep, and this condition is especially prevailing now in this and the other central States, and is spreading to those both east and west. There seems to be a settled conviction that sheep are to be good property, both for wool and mutton for some years to come. As a rule it is a wise thing to continue flocks on the farm, and those who do so find themseves doing better than others who go from one extreme to another in live stock breeding. While sheep under low prices of wool may dot be so profitable as now, yet under the system of steady holding on to them one year with another, those who do so find that it is better and most profitable. They are always ready when the high tide comes, to reap the profits, while others must live a year or two getting ready.—Indiana Farmer.

Walton Pike Incident.

IDLEWILD, KY., Sept. 22, 1905.

I noticed in last week's RECORDER an article on free turnpikes. What is said in the article is principally true. That an indebtedness will be placed on the county goes without saying; but I can not see why a 25 cent tax will not keep the pikes in good condition. The amount of money now paid to the toll-gate keepers will equal the graft or leakage which will take place under the free turnpike system.

What if the taxes are more, and we have to work more days on the public roads? We should do it without grumbling. We owe it to our county, to our State and to civilization.

The writer accuses the free turnpike men of taking from others their money. He virtually accuses us of legal theft. We may be a little unscrupulous in this matter, but it is no more than the others would do if they could force us to build new pikes for them. "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander."

Yes, I may be a thief, but no man ever accused me of being a hypocrite. I wear no sheep's clothing. I hide my light not under a bushel. I frankly state that I favor free turnpikes because my toll is more than my taxes would be.

A few who have had their hair rubbed the wrong way have other reasons, but the most of us are for it because it will be lighter on our pocket books. I believe in "telling the truth and shaming the devil." I have no use for a man who is ashamed of the course he is going to pursue and runs around whining out some other excuse for his actions.

If free turnpikes cost us less than they do now, we are for them, and if they would cost the dirt road fellows less they would be for them too, for the fashion of "the world is to avoid cost."

What if the roads are not kept in as good condition. We would rather have worse roads than to be held up every 4 or 5 miles at a toll-gate. Toll roads are relics of barbarism. They are the earmarks of an unenlightened people. Across the river in the grand states of Indiana and Ohio they do not have an imposition like toll-gates, because they are an enlightened, progressive people. The people of Boone country are fit subjects of the 15th cenury. Of course we expect to hear the squeal of the mud-hens. Let them be enterprising; let them go down in their pockets and build roads as we have done, and then make them free. Vote, boys, vote, and remember what they would do to us if they had a chance. PROGRESS.

To the Editor of the Recorder:

Allow me space in your paper, as I think I have a more practical plan for the Burley Tobacco Growers than any I have yet seen. It is this: That all the growers bind themselves to stick together, elect a good Board of Control in each county; said boards to elect a State Board. The County Boards to make an arrangement with the county tobacco dealers to receive and take care of the tobacco of those not having suitable barn room or needing the money. Have either these dealers or an inspector to put a price on the tobacco, give them receipts for their crops and make an arrangement with county banks so that receipts will stand as security for three fourths the value of a crop. Then offer the whole Burley crop to the Trust at a price to be accepted by February 1, 1906. If the Trust does not buy, then double the price and plant no tobacco in 1906. Respectfully,
R. J. MADDEN.

An exchange advises the turkey raisers to sell early. There is more money for the farmers by selling now than in holding later. Government reports show a big crop of turkeys in the West, which is bound to hammer down prices at the final close of the season.

Some of the farmers are very uneasy about their tobacco, much of which is said to be rotting badly in the barns. Tobacco is very large and coarse this year, and unusually sappy which makes it susceptible to house burn, consequently it will have to be given very close attention.

James Hogan and wife, of Riverside, Ohio, have the sympathy of a very large number of Boone county people in their sorrow, the result of the death of their son Edward at their home on the afternoon of the 19th inst. Eddie Hogan was born in Pulaski county, this State on Sept. 23d, 1874. His parents came to this county about 1877, where Eddie grew to manhood, and went to work for J. H. Heekin & Co., in Cincinnati, about eight years ago, during which period he lost only two or three days from his labor. Eddie Hogan was a quiet, kind, good natured boy, and these traits were prominent in his manhood. He was a favorite with the firm in whose employ he had served so faithfully. The family have the sympathy of a large number of Boone county friends.

The Kentucky and Ohio Burley Tobacco Company, filed articles of incorporation in the county clerk's office in Lexington, on the 21st inst., the capitalization being $1,500,000. The board of directors is to consist of 15 members to be chosen from the various sections of the burley belt. Ten of these were elected as follows: William Adams, of Harrison county; J. W. Newman, of Woodford; Henry C. London, Brown county, Ohio; Archibald Stuart, of Cincinnati; Walter J. Freidlander, of Cincinnati; E. G. Berry, Cynthiana, Ky.; W. B. Hawkins, Lexington, W. C. McChord, Springfield, Ky.; Wallace Sharp, of Bath county, and J. W. Hughes, of Mercer county. The other five Directors will be selected at another meeting to be held today and then the board will elect permanent officers.

The county was startled one day last week by the announcement that Eulass Morgan, a farmer who lived near Corinth, while delirious from fever, had cut his wife's throat and then his own. The death of both was momentarily expected, but heroic measures on the part of physicians revived them, and on Wednesday of last week Morgan was brought to Williamston and tried for lunacy before Judge Conrad. Being adjudged insane Sheriff Barker was ordered to convey him at once to Lakeland asylum. I. C. Tanner was appointed to assist him, and the trio left on the four o'clock train that afternoon.

They experienced no difficulty until they reached a point near Campbellsburg, Ky., when Morgan grew restless and asked for permission to get a drink of water, which was granted, the officers accompanying him.

As he was returning to his seat in the car the Sheriff guided him along the aisle, and when the seat was reached quick as a flash Morgan jumped through the window, carrying sash and glass with him. Barker grabbed him by the coat collar in an endeavor to pull him back into the car, and held him in this manner until the train, which was running at a high rate of speed, had traveled fully two hundred yards, and his strength failing he was compelled to let go of Morgan, while Tanner prevented Barker from falling out of the window grabbing him about the waist. When the train arrived at Campbellsburg the officers telegraphed for bloodhounds, but could not get them, and retraced their steps to the point where the insane man had dropped to the ground. They found two hats, one belonging to Barker and the other to Morgan, and also saw foot and hand prints in the mud. They telegraphed a number of stations and began a diligent search, but failing to find their man they returned home. The next day two men discovered a stranger wandering about near the village of Province, Ky., two miles from Campbellsburg, and from descriptions they had read in papers at once concluded that the man was Morgan, so they captured him and telegraphed Sheriff Barker who, in company with Mr. Tanner, hurried to the scene, took Morgan into custody and conveyed him to Lakeland.

Morgan stated that he had run through a tunnel, then crossed several fields and found shelter all night in a tree. The two officers never had a more strenuous experience and deserve much credit for the hard work they did in performing their duty.—Williamstown Courier.

To the Teachers, Trustees and Dealers in Boone county:—As many erroneous opinions are abroad in the county, concerning our text books, I take this plan of informing those who are especially interested. As county adoption was made in 1901, and continuing five years, "Judson & Bender's Literature Readers," "Hutchinson's 'Our Little Bodies,'" "Reed & Kellogg's Language & Lessons in English," "Johnson's Spellers" and "Lee's History," continue legal text books until July, 1906. These books are published by Eastern companies, who have complied with the law in every particular. The American Book Company which have been furnishing the remainder of our text books, having forfeited its bond and refusing to execute a new bond, the State Superintendent of Schools, say, "that it will be unlawful for the common schools of this Commonwealth to continue using or permit to be used any of the text books published by the said American Book Co. on any such county adoption contracts, as all such county adoption are forfeited by said A. B. Co. Supt. Fuqua further says: "It will be required of all counties having such contracts for text books published by A. B. C., to discontinue their use, and substitute for such books the corresponding books of the State Uniform Series. The A. B. C. have been furnishing for the past four years, as textbooks for our county, Arithmetics, Geographies, Civil Government, Ky. History, and Composition. Consequently it will be necessary to change county adoption for State Series, excepting where the text is the same. I hope I have made this plain. The penalties imposed for using other books than the State Series, except such as are under legal contract, are upon the County School Books Commission and Teachers, the former being liable to a fine of from $100 to $500, and the latter (teachers) cannot draw salary while using other books than those under legal State or County contract. I trust Teachers and those interested will do all in their power to enforce provisions of this law.

J. M. SNYDER,
Chairman County Commission.

The country is full of extremely large heads of cabbage this year, and Lute Aylor, of Gunpowder, is conceded to be at the head of the procession. A few days ago he sent a large cabbage head to one of his sisters, out of which she made three gallons of kraut, all the slaw she desired, ate a meal or two off of it, and then telephoned him, asking what to do with the remainder, and he answered: "Bury it for me this winter."

All other persons 25c each.

In case of rain on the 4th, game will be played on Friday, Oct. 6th.

Game called at 2:00 o'clock p. m.

The Boones and the Belleview teams played an uninteresting game of base ball here last Saturday afternoon, the score being 7 to 2 in favor of the Boones. Brady and Hawes and Sandford and Cook were the batteries. Following is the score by innings:

Hits—Boones 7; Bellevue 5, struck out by Brady 5; by Sandford 7.

The features of this game were Sandford's pitching and Harve Smith's heavy batting and daring base running.

The Boones defeated the Aurora team 3 to 1 in their game. Following is the score:

Hits—Boones 7; Aurora 6. Struck out—By Conner 6; by Tafferty 8.

The sensation of the game was a wondeoful running catch executed by Willie Hughes.

Walton defeated Hebron 14 to 10 at Walton, last Saturday.

The Aurora people have good evidence that the Boones are ball players as well as farmers.

Ed Rice, of Idlewild, was an early arrival in town, last Saturday. He had on his reefer's clothes. Ed is always for the Boones if he is not for some other team.

Manager Bancroft, of the Cincinnati Reds, has notified Manager Crisler, of the Boones, that if the 4th of October is a rainy day that the Reds will be here to play on Friday, the 6th day of October. Bear this in mind.

Dr. Crisler, manager of the Boone base ball team, was in Cincinnati, last Friday, and with the assistance of A. B. Whitlock, succeeded in closing a date for a game between his team and the Cincinnati Reds at the Burlington park on the afternoon of Wednesday, October 4th. This will be the first appearance of a National League team on the diamond in this county, and as Dr. Crisler has gone to considerable trouble and expense to secure this attraction, it is hoped that the people will give the game a liberal patronage. The Reds will bring their regular lineup and show the people how professionals handle themselves and the ball on the diamond.

The Hebron and Garrison ball clubs will cross bats at Hebron; and the Boones and the Walton team at Walton, next Saturday afternoon.

The Boones and the Grays will play at the Burlington park next Monday at 2 p. m.

DEATH WON AT LAST.

A Woman Made a Strenuous Fight For Life With Violet Leaves.

Dayton, Sept. 20.—Mrs. W. H. McCormick died at her home, Fourth and Vine streets, of abdominal cancer. Her case, which was a rather remarkable one, has attracted considerable attention in the medical world. Over a year ago she was given up to die by all physicians who were called in for consultation. It was then that Mr. McCormick learned of the violet leaf cure and treatment was begun. Tea of the leaf was administered regularly, and in a short while the patient showed marked improvement. The intense pain ceased and in the course of a few months she was able to get about almost as well as ever. A few days ago she suffered a relapse, resulting in her death.

Louisville, Ky., Sept. 22.—Sydney J. Gates, general agent of the Big Four railroad, is to be married in October to Miss Mattie Moore Austin, a nurse, who attended him during a recent illness at the Norton infirmary. Mr. Gates was in the hospital for the purpose of having an operation performed on one of his eyes. Miss Austin was placed in charge of the railroad man, and, before his recovery was nearly completed, cupid came along, and three weeks ago, when Mr. Gates left the hospital, the nurse had promised to become his wife. Miss Austin comes from a prominent Lewisburg, Va., family.

CENSUS REPORTS.

Some Interesting Facts in Regard To Covington Given Out.

Covington, Ky., Sept. 21.—The report of the United States census bureau for 1902 and 1903, that has just been issued, gives some very startling facts concerning Covington that are not generally known. Covington at that time had a population of 44,759, with an area of 1,509.5 acres. There are 193 licensed saloons. The public library is credited with having 7,017 volumes, which is less than any city in its class, and in these years there were 86,085 withdrawals of books, which is more than any other city of its class. Covington had 310 fire hydrants and 43.7 miles of water mains. It is lighted by 327 arc lights, 28 incandescent and 449 other lamps. It has 615,977 square yards of paved streets, and 26.8 miles of sewers. Upon his arrival he grasped his six-year-old naughter by the chin to kiss her, lifting her head back. The little one sank to the ground dead. A physician found that her neck had been broken by her father. The father is almost crazed over the strange occurrence whereby his caress was turned into a death blow for his only child, whom he dearly loved.

CORPORATIONS OR PEOPLE?

Which Will Control the Majority in the Coming Meeting of Congress?

As Speaker Cannon and other republican leaders in congress are reported to be opposed to railroad rate legislation, there will, of course, be no power given to the interstate commerce commission to regulate unreasonable rates at the coming session. Another farce will be presented for the edification of the people by enacting still more legislation to abolish rebates, though the present laws on the statute books are ample to punish corporations, or their officials. But it is intended to try to bunco the voters again into believing that a republican congress is willing to legislate against their friends, the corporations, and yet continue to allow the people to be plundered.

When the original interstate commerce act was passed it was supposed that it gave power to the interstate commerce commission to regulate rates and establish a reasonable rate in place of one that had been declared unreasonable. But the railroad attorneys have been able to discover a flaw in the original law, so the people have continued to pay unreasonable rates, in most instances, ever since. Occasionally, when the evidence was so overwhelming against a railroad that there was no escape, a rate has been partially reduced to stop public clamor, but by changing the classification of freight rates the general tariff is higher now than when the original law was passed.

The whole question involved is, shall the railroads control the government, or shall the people control the railroads. From present appearances Speaker Cannon and a large majority of the republican members, enough to control congress, are determined to allow the corporations a further lease of power for plunder. As the congress that is to assemble next December will serve until March 4, 1907, the outlook for relief is indeed doleful.

There is but one way that the people can obtain the legislation to control the railroads at the coming session of congress, and that is by bringing pressure to bear on their representatives before they assemble in Washington. Hold public meetings, and pledge your member of congress and senators to vote as you instruct them, or if a public meeting is not possible, instruct them personally, according to your own view of the case. Congressmen and senators are your servants, paid by you, to carry out your wishes.

Fortunately, there is another election of congress next year, and the nominations of congressmen and state legislators who elect senators, will occur next spring and summer. That is the "big stick" that can be used to club recalcitrant representatives to obey the voice of the people. Express your firm determination to vote for the renomination of those only who obey instructions. Let your representative know that a vote for the corporations will be the death knell of his ambition. Serve the senators the same way and nominate and elect to the state legislature only those who will vote for a United States senator whose record shows he is for the people.

There will be a terrible house cleaning if this suggested course is followed, for unfortunately the great majority of congress are under obligations to the corporations. Nine out of every ten will have railroad passes in their pockets. With many, the influence and money of the corporations secured their election.

It is a fight for supremacy, with the people on one side with the votes; on the other side the corporations with the money—thousands of millions. Which shall prevail the voters or the money?

——The beef and coal trusts may absorb so much of the average citizen's income that in a few years he may feel that he can not afford life insurance.—Washington Star.

——The tariff will never be revised by the republican party so long as it is not compelled to act. There are plenty of issues awaiting courageous and united democrats.—Washington Post.

——It is now announced that Secretary Shaw will not quit the cabinet till next February. Therefore it is fair to state that he will not make open confession of his candidacy for the republican nomination for president till next February.—Galveston News.

——"Why 'Uncle Joe' walks the floor," is explained by the Washington Post (Ind.) when it says that the chairmanship of the appropriations committee is still undecided, and that the revisionists are rallying their forces for a persistent attack on the tariff wall, and are hopeful of getting the president to aid them.

——Congress can do no more than to consider itself a peace mission and arrange a treaty with the outraged people of the country, settling tariff robbery, rebates, and all the other domestic matters. The great pacifier is on record as desirous of this peace—Pittsburg Post.

——The Springfield Republican (Ind.) calls attention to a point worth making: "It is observed that only one person—the pope—has thanked God for the peace; everyone else has thanked President Roosevelt. But the pope could not have meant any disrespect to the president."

LABOR AND THE TARIFF.

Question for American Workingmen, Farmers and Business Men to Decide.

The late session of the trades union congress in England by a vote representing 1,353,060 members against 26,000 declared for free trade. The resolution declared that "any departure therefrom would be detrimental to the interests of the working classes upon whom the burden of protection would press the most heavily." The resolution also expressed the opinion that a system of preference, or retaliation, would prove a hindrance to international progress and peace.

It would be well for American organized labor to ponder on these declarations, instead of blindly following the lead of the protectionists, for it must be plain to every one, that the consumers pay the tariff tax, not only what the government receives, but the much greater tax which the protected trusts collect as extra profit.

The most eminent economists have arrived at the conclusion that the United States has prospered in spite of protection and that the day has dawned when the protection shoe will begin to pinch. The dual tariff system, which the revision faction of the republican protectionists have declared for at the late Chicago conference, will prove—as the English workingmen declare—"a hindrance to international progress and peace."

It virtually proposes a tariff war with other countries, which Germany and France and Russia and Austria have already began and which the United States was one of the first to originate by raising her tariff wall.

The question for American workingmen, farmers and business men to consider is, are they benefited by trust high prices, fostered by the protection the tariff provides. Is not the fact that the trusts are selling many of their products cheaper abroad than here, a proof of the enormous tax the protected interests are collecting from our own people?

The republican party is controlled by these protected trusts and dare not throw off this "old man of the sea," who is a heavy burden to those who pay the tax and who receive but little if any of the profit for carrying him. The democratic position on the tariff is what this country must come to, not free trade with no custom houses, but a tariff for revenue—which will protect all alike, instead of protecting the few at the expense of the many.

COAL TRUST IS FORTUNATE

It Seems to Escape the Personal Attention of President Roosevelt.

There is one trust that President Roosevelt seems to fear to tackle, and that is the anthracite coal trust. No other trust is so openly evading the law, and none other weighs more heavily upon the people. The coal trust is undoubtedly guilty of two crimes, that hardly requires legal evidence to prove the coal barons law breakers.

There is no more complete combine to restrict trade, for the trust raises the prices of its product at will. It is in collusion with the railroads to plunder the consumers, and whether the trust controls the railroads, or the railroads control the trust, is immaterial, except that both are combined to evade the law, yes, not only evade the law, but openly defy it.

No attorney general has dared to lift his voice against the coal trust, although the evidence to convict the combine, or the individual coal barons, has been furnished by a public-spirited citizen—Mr. Hearst—and is still on file in the department of justice or in the hands of the president.

Hon. Robert Baker, of Brooklyn, in writing for the New York Herald on this subject calls attention to President Roosevelt's evident objection to prosecute the most objectionable trust criminals, except the beef barons, which the president wishes to appear to be especially severe against, and declares that:

"All the power of the federal government is used to send the moonshiner, smuggler and other petty criminals to prison, while their property is confiscated, but the railroad and trust criminal is entertained at the white house. Why this discrimination against the beef packers? Almost simultaneous with this fulmination against them the king of the coal trust (loot $60,000,000) and archpriest of the railroad trust, J. P. Morgan, is a guest at Oyster Bay.

"Well may Armour cry out against such favoritism. Why is Chicago scourged and Wall street feted?

"Why the mailed fist for Swift and Morris and the glad hand for Rockefeller, Havemeyer, Morgan and Baer? Why defy oil and coal and crucify beef?"

Those questions are serious ones, and the American people should ponder them, and if possible evolve an answer, for until a satisfactory answer is forthcoming there is certainly no "square deal" all around.

——Secretary Shaw and Gov. Cummins might at least discuss protocols as preliminaries to a treaty of peace under which neither should be asked to pay indemnity.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat (Rep.)

——Secretary Shaw says he forgives Gov. Cummins. Now if Gov. Cummins will forgive Secretary Shaw the country will try to forget both of them.—Washington Star.

——It is clear that the senatorial candidates of Illinois are not entering upon a Chesterfieldian campaign. Senator Cullom, who "looks like Lincoln," and has served more than 20 years in the senate, is already called a "has-been," a "mossback," and a "fossil," none of which epithets are very wicked, but what answer will ex-Gov. Yates make to the nickname "Dub?"—Baltimore American.

HOW A FRIENDSHIP GREW

The Story

Whether Hand Sapolio got a more enthusiastic welcome in homes where Sapolio was an old and tried friend, or where it was a stranger, is a question. Where women had come to rely on Sapolio for rapid, thorough cleansing in every part of the house except the laundry, they commenced without loss of time, to avail of this new prize. Grubby little hands, and stained, workworn older ones, whitened, softened, and smoothed out as if by magic, callous spots disappeared, and complexions cleared. Children ceased their strenuous objections to the scrubbing up process, because it became a pleasure. It freshened up the hands after dish-washing, removing the most disagreeable feature of that necessary task. It was found to keep delicate baby skins from chafing better than salve or powder, and the crowning note in the song of delight came when an adult member of the family used it in a full bath, and realized that a Turkish Bath at a cost of one dollar was outdone by a small fraction of the little, ten-cent, velvety cake.

But, strange though it may seem, there were people who had not learned to prize Sapolio. To these the advertising of Hand Sapolio came as a surprise. Sapolio, a scouring soap, adapted for the hands, the face, the general toilet? Impossible, it would be horrid. Who ever heard of such a use? Finally a bold shopper carried home a cake. Does it look like kitchen Sapolio? No one is sure, and a cake of that is bought, and comparison made. Behold a family using both the Sapolios for every conceivable purpose, and comparing notes! After easily and quickly cleansing a greasy pan with Sapolio, Jane thought the other would be gritty, and was astonished at the smooth, dainty lather. Another was certain it would harden the hands and could scarcely realize how soft and "comfy" they felt after the washing.

Then began the excitement of adventure; what would the new soap NOT do? A girl tried a shampoo. Her hair, pretty, soft and silky "went up" perfectly, with none of the unmanageable- ness that generally exists for a full week after the usual process. A man used the delightful lather for shaving, and felt no need for cold cream afterwards. A plenty free was treated to a daily bathing with the full suds, and promptly became clear. Tartar on the teeth yielded to it, and feet that had a tendency towards hardening of the skin regained their natural condition, till another family had joined the chorus of friendly acclaim. And so it is everywhere, those who know the "elder brother" welcome the new-comer for the sake of the first known, and those who meet both for the first time are plunged into a whimsical worry as to which they could better spare if they had to make a choice.

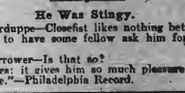
TRY HAND SAPOLIO.

Its steady use will keep the hands of any busy woman as white, untanned and pretty as if she was under the constant care of a city manicure. It is truly "The Dainty Woman's Friend," in the suburbs or on the farm.

Those ugly dark brown streaks on the neck, arising from tight collars, and the line where the sunburn stops, can be wiped out by the velvety lather of HAND SAPOLIO. It is, indeed, "The Dainty Woman's Friend."



The Erie Railroad has arranged for the immediate expenditure of $225,000 for the installation of the most modern and efficient railway signal that has yet been put on the market. It is known as the Hall Electric Semaphore Normal Clear System, and is operated by stationary storage batteries. The line between Bergen, N. J., and Middletown, a distance of 64 miles, is to be equipped at once. For the first 32 miles, the signals will be but two-thirds of a mile apart; for the rest of the distance, about one and one-third miles apart. It will require five power plants for charging the batteries, which will be located at Rutherford Junction, Ridgewood Junction, Suffern, Otisville and Middletown. The line to be protected has two and four tracks at different places, and is the most congested part of the Erie System. Hitherto a manual block, which is a tower with signals operated by a towerman, has been used as a block protection, but it has been deemed best to install an automatic system for further protection, and to accelerate the movement of trains. The new system will be extended over the entire line in the future.

"GENERAL" FOR 25 CENTS

The Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway is distributing a very beautiful lithograph, 18x25 inches, of the famous engine "General" which is now on exhibition in the Union Depot, Chattanooga, Tenn. The picture is ready for framing and will be mailed to any address for twenty-five cents. The "General" was captured by the Andrews' Raiders at Big Shanty (now Kennesaw), Georgia, on the Western & Atlantic Railroad, April 12th, 1862, and was recaptured by Conductor W. A. Fuller, Anthony Murphy and others, near Ringgold, Ga., after an exciting chase of about ninety miles. It was one of the most thrilling exploits of the Civil War. The object of the raid was to burn the bridges on the Western & Atlantic Railroad and cut off the Confederate Army from its base of supplies. A booklet, "The Story of the General," sent free upon application.

ESAU, LORD OF EDOM

OUR BIBLE STORY by the "Highway and Byway" Preacher
(A Vision Between the Lines of God's Inspired Word.)

(Copyright, 1906, by J. M. Edson.)

Scripture Authority.—"And Esau took his wives, and his sons, and his daughters, and all the persons of his house, and his cattle, and all his beasts, and all his substance which he had got in the land of Canaan; and went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob. For his riches were more than that they might dwell together; and the land wherein they were strangers could not bear them because of their cattle. Thus dwelt Esau in Mount Seir. . . . And Jacob sent messengers before him to Esau his brother unto the land of Seir, the country of Edom."—Gen. 36:6-8; Gen. 32:3.

ESAU put the finishing touches to the bow with the deft hand of an expert.

"There," he said, as he glanced along the tough, springy bit of wood in his hand, and here and there took off a tiny curling shaving with the keen edge of his knife-blade, until at last it seemed to meet the approval in his critical eye. "There, now, we are ready for the gut."

The young man who had been following the operations with absorbed interest, and had anticipated the next step in the process, quickly reached forth the twisted tendon and watched almost breathlessly while his father bent the bow over his knee and secured the gut at either end. As he took the completed bow in his hands and twanged the string affectionately, he exclaimed:

"I wish you were going with us, father."

"I wish I were," warmly responded Esau, and then added, as a merry twinkle came into his eye, "but it is lucky for you that I am not, for I would not give you a chance to get a single antelope."

"Oh, I'm not so sure of that," the other replied, ready to accept the challenge, "for I am pretty quick with the bow, and sure of my aim. Watch that!" And the arrow sped from the bow and was soon quivering fairly in the center of the trunk of a small sapling some 200 yards distant.

"Well done, Eliphaz. You do your father credit," exclaimed Esau, in admiration.

"The boy's as clever with the bow as I was at his age," he added, as the young hunter, equipped for the chase, started off.

"Yes," responded Judith, the boy's mother, "and he seems to be as fond of hunting as you used to be."

"As fond as I am now, you might say, for it is not that I have tired of the chase that keeps me from trailing the deer and hunting the lion in his lair."

"Oh, the burden of riches and power," responded the woman, with mock reproach in her voice.

Esau smiled good-naturedly. The years had indeed dealt bountifully with him. Great prosperity had come. His substance had increased until he had found the land of his father Isaac far too small for the needs of his growing flocks and herds, and he had a couple of years before moved eastward and southward into the land of Edom. And there his wealth and importance had continued to increase. The king, eager to form alliance with him, made him one of the lords of the realm, and mustered into his service his strong force of fighting men. Thus it had come to pass that the new burdens and responsibilities had interfered with the wild, free life of the huntsman, and often with longing heart he had wished for its return. But if riches almost without measure and honors and power can bring contentment and self-complacency, then Esau should have enjoyed such frame of mind, and he did. With riches and success there had grown up in his heart a sort of contempt and commiseration for his earlier life and its simplicity and limitations. He could not understand how, if the birthright and blessing were so important as he had at one time supposed, that he could have prospered so, and Jacob, according to all the reports he could gather from the far distant country where Jacob had gone, had done so poorly. More than once he had laughed with Judith over the distress and bitterness which had filled their hearts when Jacob had stolen the blessing.

"I'm glad," he exclaimed, after a long silence, "that Jacob escaped, if for no other reason than that he might see some day how little I needed the blessing and the birthright. Why, I have more flocks and herds than Jacob has sheep, and more gold and silver than he ever saw. And not only so as regards my possessions, but consider the number of men bearing arms who are in my following."

"Yes," assented his wife, proudly, "I overheard one of the men saying yesterday that the king had no more powerful ally than thou."

"Which is true, as was proved in the last struggle which the king had with the fierce tribes inhabiting the country to the south of Edom. Had it not been that my men had stood firm in the face of the enemy and checked the terrific assault when the rest of the king's army was retreating, they would have been overthrown and have pillaged and laid waste the country." And the memory of the struggle brought that flash and fire into his eyes, and stirred every nerve and muscle in his powerful body to that alert, tense attitude which bespoke tremendous strength and undaunted courage.

"But," he continued, musingly, as his thoughts reverted to Jacob, "I cannot understand what father could have meant when he declared that I should serve my brother."

"Oh, it was the whimsical notion of a weak old man," Judith rejoined with an impatient toss of her head, as though she would dismiss the matter as of no possible significance.

"But I have heard mother make the same remark, and I believe she claimed that God had so declared before our birth."

"Well, you are not silly enough to believe it or let it trouble you, are you? Your riches and power are enough to disprove as utterly impossible and ridiculous any such condition."

"Yes," he replied, in rather dubious, uncertain tone, "it does seem so. But sometimes it troubles me. I cannot shake off the thought altogether."

"Oh, bother your vague fears. Consider the realities. Look!" she exclaimed, pointing towards a body of horsemen that had just come into view and was rapidly approaching. "That doesn't look much as though you would ever have to serve another, much less your brother Jacob."

Esau made no response, but watched with proud eyes his faithful followers. Then, turning and beckoning to one of his servants, he ordered him to bring up his horse, and was soon in the saddle and riding off with his men. A bit of news which they brought changed his plans, and instead of continuing in the direction of the chief city of Edom, where he was to meet the king, he turned into the trail which led to the northward. Word had been brought that a strong body of Syrians, with their flocks and herds was moving to the southward, and both as a cautionary measure and with the thought of tribute or plunder to be gained from the strangers, Esau determined at once to go to meet them. But they had not gone far when they encountered a company of men, and to the inquiries of the vanguard of Esau's forces they replied that they were bearers of messages to Esau, lord of Edom, and could they direct them to him?

Fearing treachery of some kind, the men questioned the strangers sharply, desiring to know the nature of their business with their chief, when at that moment, Esau, attracted by the commotion, rode forward. The strangers bowed low.

"We are bearers," the spokesman of the party declared, of a message to Esau, lord of Edom, from Jacob, his brother. Canst thou tell where he may be found?"

"Jacob!" exclaimed Esau, unable to hide his emotions. "Comest thou from Jacob, the son of Isaac, who has been sojourning in Syria? Where is he?"

"Yea, the same, and he is tarrying with his flocks and herds and his wives and children in Mount Gilead. But who art thou?" and the speaker looked uneasily upon the man before him, and his fierce-looking armed attendants who crowded about him.

"I am Esau," he said, watching with a half-amused smile the surprise and consternation displayed on the faces of the men before him.

"Our master has sent us to thee," at last the messenger managed to say, "and has commanded us saying: 'Thus shall ye speak unto my lord Esau: "Thy servant Jacob saith thus, I have sojourned with Laban, and stayed there until now; and I have oxen, and asses, flocks and men servants, and women servants; and I have sent to tell my lord that I may find grace in thy sight." '"

That night as he rested with his men the old memories crowded in upon him, but the bitterness and hatred of the long ago were gone. He would forget the past. He had all that the world could give. Why need he be envious of Jacob?

And while God was working change in the heart of Esau and making the way safe for Jacob's return, He was bringing Jacob face to face with the sins of the past and stirring his heart to true and deep repentance, for when the messengers returned and reported that Esau was coming with 400 armed men, his heart sank within him, and he was seized with a great fear.

"Oh, God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac, the Lord which saidst unto me, Return unto thy country, and to thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee: I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which thou hast shewed unto thy servant; for with my staff I passed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands. Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau; for I fear him, lest he will come and smite me, and the mother with the children. And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good, and make thy seed as the sand of the sea, which cannot be numbered for multitude."

And as Jacob pleaded the promises which God had made to him, and confessed his own sins and short-comings and needs, there came into his heart a new faith in God and a new purpose to serve Him. And there appeared unto him the angel of the Lord, and wrestled with him until the breaking of the day. And the angel blessed him there and said: "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob (that is supplanter), but Israel (that is a prince of God), for as a prince hast thou power with God, and with men, and hast prevailed."

What though he halted on his crippled thigh, where the finger of God had left His mark as he had wrestled with Him, what though Esau were coming, the peace of God filled his heart; the fear was gone. He knew that the danger was past. Esau the lord of Edom and Israel the prince of God were reconciled.

BEAR STEALS A LONG FUSE

Idaho Brute of Enormous Size Performs Queer Antics at the Laclede Mine.

Wallace, Idaho.—A big black bear, fat as a hog from several weeks' feast upon the luscious crop of huckleberries in the mountains, shuffled into the powder house at the Laclede mine and walked away with 600 feet of fuse. The bear unconcernedly ambled away from the buildings and disappeared into the brush with his booty. He is said to be of enormous size, being nearly as large as a grizzly.

In the morning he made his first appearance at the mine. The woman cook was completing her morning's work, and was tripping along for the cook-house bearing some scraps to throw upon the refuse pile, when she heard a snort of surprise, and, glancing ahead, was nearly overcome to see a large bear contentedly feeding himself upon the refuse. The cook sprinted for the cabin and barricaded the door.

When the men came out of the mine they were told of the bear's presence, but by that time it had disappeared. It was then noticed that the water piped to the cabin from a spring was muddled. This fact was associated with the bear's visit. One of the miners then went up to the spring to ascertain the cause of the muddy water. When he reached it he observed a great, black creature wallowing in the cool water. He commenced throwing stones at the animal, which emerged leisurely from its bath, walked a few paces, rose to its haunches until it appeared to the miner to be nearly as tall as the surrounding pine trees, and then snarled in a vicious manner, exhibiting a fierce row of teeth. As he was unarmed the man considered a well conducted retreat the best move, and withdrew, not without confusion. The unwelcome visitor disappeared until later in the day, when he was seen coming from the powder house with the roll of fuse.

DOG FOILS BRIGAND BAND.

Animal Follows Robbers Into Cave and Paws Open Hole Large Enough for Master to Escape.

Rome.—An interesting brigand story comes from Palermo. Four brigands terrorized the district of Castelermini and entered the villa of a wealthy land owner at Liberto.

In the absence of the owner, the bandits seized his two children. They secured and bound the eldest, and imprisoned him in the cellar of the house. A letter was left behind demanding a ransom of $1,000 from the father for the younger son, whom they removed to a grotto at San Giovanni, where the brigands had their lair. A little dog followed the bandits and his young master.

The animal entered the grotto with them, and a few minutes afterwards, when the ruffians were asleep at the entrance of the cave, discovered a small aperture. The dog increased the opening by using his paws. Eventually the hole was large enough to enable the boy to emerge from his place of confinement. Followed by his dog he was able to reach his home during the night. The police discovered the grotto, and the four brigands were captured.

Train Saved by Boy Camper.

William Bates, a boy camper, saved a train from being wrecked on the Dubuque division of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railroad near La Crosse, Wis. He saw that the track had been undermined, and, tearing off his shirt as a signal, ran to meet the oncoming train, which was stopped within a few feet of the washout. The Pioneer Limited narrowly escaped destruction at Lake Pepin, being stopped within a few feet of a landslide which had covered the track.

PAINFUL PERIODS

AMERICAN WOMEN FIND RELIEF

The Case of Miss Irene Crosby Is One of Thousands of Cures Made by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

How many women realize that menstruation is the balance wheel of a woman's life, and while no woman is entirely free from periodical suffering, it is not the plan of nature that women should suffer so severely.

Miss Irene Crosby

Thousands of American women, however, have found relief from all monthly suffering by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as it is the most thorough female regulator known to medical science. It cures the condition which causes so much discomfort and robs menstruation of its terrors.

Miss Irene Crosby, of 313 Charlton Street East Savannah, Ga., writes:

"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is a true friend to women. It has been of great benefit to me, curing me of irregular and painful menstruation when everything else had failed, and I gladly recommend it to other suffering women."

Women who are troubled with painful or irregular menstruation, backache, bloating (or flatulence), leucorrhœa, falling, inflammation or ulceration of the uterus, ovarian troubles, that "bearing-down" feeling, dizziness, faintness, indigestion, nervous prostration or the blues, should take immediate action to ward off the serious consequences, and be restored to perfect health and strength by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and then write to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., for further free advice. Thousands have been cured by so doing.

The Apiarist of the Department of Agriculture, Frank Benton, has started on a tour of Asiatic exploration to discover and bring back the best varieties obtainable of honey bees. Mr. Benton lately introduced a so-called stingless bee. While this insect possesses a sting, it seems to have forgotten how to use it; at least it is believed that it is an acquisition of great value. These bees can be handled like so many flies, scooped up by the handful and manipulated precisely as though they possessed no stings. As every amateur bee keeper knows there is a wide difference in the amiability or gentleness of the various kinds of bees, the Italian varieties are gentle while the black bees are usually decidedly vicious. However, Mr. Benton says that probably the most savage bees are certain crosses between the black bees and the Italian. He will also attempt to secure some of the large East Indian bees which have especially long tongues for deep throated flowers.

Every week there are bunches and car loads of cattle at the stock yards which sell above $6 per hundred. Enquiry into their breeding and feeding invariably reveals the fact that they are good grades from pure bred sires, and that the feeding has been carefully conducted to develop them rapidly. An instance at point is that of the work in this line of an excellent farmer near Heyworth, Illinois, Mr. J. O. Davis. He is one of the best cattle feeders in the country. A few days ago he sold six car loads at the yards which he fed to a finish on his own farm. His prime Polled Angus steers, 18 in number averaged 1,368 pounds, and sold at $6.50 per hundred. Another lot of high grades brought $6.30, and still another lot of grades sold at $6.25. Attention is called to these cattle to show what painstaking both in breeding and feeding will do. On the same day these cattle were sold there were heavier fat steers sold at $5.60. The difference in quality was that the latter were not so well bred, nor fed and lacked the thick meat which sells highest. Skilled cattle buyers detect these things quickly when cattle are on the market.—Indiana Farmer.

The synopsis of the crop report issued from the Agricultural Department of Kentucky is as follows:

The corn crop is a full one. The yield of wheat per acre is a little below an average for the State. Oats and rye are above the average.

The tobacco crop is also a good one. Some damage was done by worms, and some on low, wet lands suffered for proper cultivation. An unusual amount has been housed for the time of year, and cutting is progressing rapidly. Some complaint has been reported of house-burning of the early cutting.

The hay crop is a full average in quantity, but somewhat damaged from too much moisture at time of harvesting.

Corn, prospect for full crop, 101; wheat, yield per acre in bushels, 11; oats, per cent. of crop compared with last year, 89, yield per acre in bushels, 26; rye, yield per acre in bushels, 13; tobacco, Burley unsold, per cent. 14; dark unsold, per cent. 25.

and beaten, in a labor riot, until covered with sores, a Chicago street car conductor applied Bucklen's Arnica Salve, and was soon sound and well. "I use it in my family," writes G. J. Welch, of Tonkonsha, Mich., "and find it perfect." Simply great for cuts and burns. Only 25c at all drug stores.

Last Thursday we found a note in our box requesting that we be at home the next day, as he had a registered letter for us. On reading the note we felt it in our bones that it was an order for the Recorder, and sure enough, it was from an old Boone county boy and contained $1.50 for the Recorder. He is in the regular army and stationed at Fort Pickens, Fla. He said "he wanted the news from old Boone and knew of no better way of getting it than by subscribing for the Recorder." Right he is.

DEPORTATION OF AN AMERICAN CITIZEN

Immigration Laws Are Broken Because of Their Failure to Provide for Emergencies.

CURIOUS AND INVOLVED QUESTIONS RAISED

Sad Tale of a Russian Jew, His Bride and Their New-Born Babe—Hard Struggle of the Husband—Federal Statutes Not Tempered with Mercy.

New York.—Strict and exacting immigration laws are of the utmost necessity. Were this not the case the country would soon become the refuge of Europe's paupers and beggars.

The federal statutes that provide for the admittance of foreigners are supposed to cover every possible case and the officials at Ellis Island are compelled to act in strict accordance with the law which does not provide for emergencies.

It was the result of the law's failure to provide for emergencies that the officials were recently compelled to deport a new-born American citizen.

It is against the law to deport an American citizen. The law does not specify any age limit in citizenship. It simply says that a child born on American soil of alien parents is an American citizen.

The baby in question was not born on terra firma, but it was born within the three-mile harbor limit placed by law as the boundary between American soil and the high seas. He is therefore an American citizen, fully entitled to all the rights and privileges therof, and his deportation has raised a most curious and involved question in immigration litigation.

The baby's parents are Lotta and Herman Romanik, both Russian Jews, both 25 years of age, and both immigrants, or, as the law calls them, aliens.

Comes to Make His Fortune.

Over three years ago Romanik came to this country from Russia. He was young, healthy, capable, and was admitted through Ellis island without the slightest trouble. It was a good start to his fortune in the new land. He was a tailor by trade, and with the industry and pertinacity of his race he established himself in short order in a small shop on Attorney street.

The shop thrived, so did Romanik's lovemaking. Back in his Russian home lived Lotta, the sweetheart of his boyhood, and the girls of the East side Ghetto had no claim for the busy little tailor, as he worked steadily month in month out, and dreamed of the day when he should bring Lotta home as a bride.

Fourteen months ago the dream was realized. Romanik would not let the girl make the trip alone. Between Russia and Attorney street lie many slips for straying immigrant feet. Not the least is Ellis island.

Returns for His Bride.

Romanik made the long trip back home and returned to America with his bride. They were passed by the medical examiners and cleared of special inquiry at Ellis Island. To all appearances at that time the wife was in perfect health—a young woman of twenty-two years, who had borne her husband a child within the year. The girl brimmed over with the joy of living and the delight of returning to the land of her husband's adoption. At Ellis Island Mrs. Lotta Romanik as an "L. P. C." was liable to become a public charge. The letter of the law was against her, and Romanik was forced to see helplessly while his wife was detained and placed on [illegible] at 11 o'clock the following morning.

It was a miserable hour, and Romanik is said to have promptly turned to the People's law firm as a last resort. The card of the People's law firm states that "Mary H Grace Quackenbos, LL. B., can be consulted and retained as attorney and counselor at law [illegible] attendance upon the courts and otherwise, especially with a view to meeting the requirements of litigants of moderate means."

Saved by Fifteen Minutes.

As a litigant of moderate means Herman Romanik sought Mrs. Quackenbos and laid his case in her hands. It was not an easy case. Mr. Watchorn said positively that he could do nothing. The law allows the Ellis island commissioner no discretionary powers in emergency cases. Everything must be referred to Washington, and it was too late to communicate with the department of commerce and labor. It was a time for quick wit and quicker action. Mrs. Quackenbos set out to procure a writ of habeas corpus. Federal judges are not always within easy reach. It was late at night before District Judge Adams was found and the writ signed.

It was served on the commissioner at Ellis island the next morning just 15 minutes before the scheduled leaving time of the steamer. The advocate of the People's law firm did not waste an instant, and Mrs. Romanik was removed from the steamer in a tug and given into the embrace of the poor little tailor and husband waiting in desperation on the New York wharf.

Romanik would take no more chances with public institutions. He placed his wife in the New York infirmary for women and children and undertook to pay $25 a week until the child should be born.

The case was set for hearing in the federal court, but never came up for trial. Twenty-five dollars a week is a heavy tax on an Attorney street tailor shop, and Romanik was compelled to give up in a few weeks. It would be five or six weeks before the birth of the baby. Mrs. Romanik became more and more violent, and the Ellis island authorities were more notified.

Mrs. Quackenbos had sailed for Halifax to take a much-needed rest, and left the case with her assistants pending her return. The Ellis island authorities contended that the woman was an epileptic, and had been prior to her arrival in this country. Her husband swore her insanity was due to her condition. To deport her now was not only dangerous but inhuman. But there was no one to blame. Each department acted strictly according to its official duty as interpreted by the bare, cold letter of the law. As an insane alien, ordered deported, the little mother-elect was once more hurried from the infirmary and taken on board the steamer. She longed for her husband, but he had long since exhausted the little tailor shop profits and was penniless.

As an accompanying alien the People's law firm endeavored to have him deported also at the expense of the government, but failed. Finally a ticket was procured for him from the United Hebrew charities, and $25 was added by the People's law firm, so that the forlorn pair might not land in Europe penniless.

Romanik's father and brother live in Liverpool. They were written to for help, and as a concession the deportation was made to Bremen instead of Russia, as the nearest stopping point to Liverpool.

American Citizen Is Born.

Everything was settled as well as it could be, when the most unexpected development of the case took place. Early in the morning the vessel was to sail Mrs. Romanik gave birth to a normal, healthy boy baby, and that baby is an American citizen. It is unlawful to deport an American citizen, but how about a citizen three hours old? Can the law, to be absolutely lawful and acting on its own laws, separate mother and child at such a moment, deport one and permit the other to remain?

It is the law. There was no Solomon to decide the question. Mrs. Quackenbos was in Halifax. The law had [illegible] with the law without regard for emergencies unprovided by the law. In an emergency like the Romanik case a human life, perhaps two, was endangered. The shock of removal undoubtedly brought on the birth of the child. What the excitement and discomfort of the voyage will lead to remain to be seen.

The Romaniks have not yet been heard from in Bremen. Should the mother die from the effects of her deportation, what then? It is an emergency unprovided for by the law. If it can be proved that the woman is perfectly sane, and not an epileptic, there is a chance to show where the law is at fault, but at present no law has been broken save in the deportation of a newborn American citizen.

INVENTS AN EXPLOSIVE.

Boy Promises to Revolutionize Great Industry—Indiana Lad Finds Remarkable Powder.

Evansville, Ind.—The bursting of a shotgun and the shattering of a boy's arm has brought to light an inventive genius in the person of Louis Byrd, a country boy, of Hazleton, Ind.

Louis Byrd, in search of a way to cut down his powder and shot bill during the hunting season, experimented with powder making until he got a combination of explosives that promise to bring him a fortune. He makes a white powder, either coarse or fine, as it is intended for blasting or gunning purposes, that is twice as powerful as nitro-smokeless powder and three times as powerful as ordinary black blasting powder. It can also be manufactured several times cheaper than either.

The boy secretly sold the explosive to miners without letting them know he made it.

Louis' brother Carl took three drachms of the waite powder from his brother's case and discharged the load from a gunbarrel. How he escaped death is a wonder, for the gunpan was flattened like a flapjack and the barrel curved to an arc of 30 degrees. To the physician who set the boy's arm, Louis Byrd said he had tried out the powder in the coal mines at Hymera, Ind., and in other places and had been offered $10,000 for the formula.

Byrd has applied for a patent. Two years ago Byrd's inventive genius cropped out in the construction of a drill to distribute onion seed.

Cured Her Rheumatism.

Deep Valley, Pa., Oct. 2nd (Special.)—There is deep interest in Green county over the cure of the little daughter of I. N. Whipkey of Rheumatism. She was a great sufferer for five or six years, and nothing seemed to do her any good till she tried Dodd's Kidney Pills. She began to improve almost at once, and now she is cured and can run and play as other children do. Mr. Whipkey says: "I am indeed thankful for what Dodd's Kidney Pills have done for my daughter; they saved her from being a cripple perhaps for life."

Dodd's Kidney Pills have proved that Rheumatism is one of the results of diseased Kidneys. Rheumatism is caused by Uric Acid in the blood. If the Kidneys are right there can be no Uric Acid in the blood and consequently no Rheumatism. Dodd's Kidney Pills make the Kidneys right.

Cuticura Soap, Ointment and Pills Cleanse the Skin and Blood of Torturing Humors — Complete Treatment $1.00.

The agonizing itching and burning of the skin, as in eczema; the frightful scaling, as in psoriasis; the loss of hair and crusting of scalp, as in scalled head; the facial disfigurement, as in pimples and ring worm; the awful suffering of infants, and anxiety of worn-out parents, as in milk crust, tetter and salt rheum—all demand a remedy of almost superhuman virtues to successfully cope with them. That Cuticura Soap, Ointment and Pills are such stands proven by the testimony of the civilized world.

A casual perusal of current literature will indicate that one need not be logical in order to be sociological.—Puck.

Quack Grass in Iowa.

Farmers in Iowa are having some worry relative to quack grass, fearing that its already heavy growth means a serious setback to farming in certain sections. In a popular bulletin just issued from Ames Prof. Pammel describes quack grass as follows:

"Quack grass may be recognized by its long, running rootstocks; stems from one to three feet high, rather broad, smooth leaves with numerous spikelets, from four to eight flowers in each spikelet. Spikes three to ten inches long. Quack grass is a naturalized weed in many sections of this country. It is a native of Europe, but is common in the eastern states."

Quack grass, says Bulletin Editor Will H. Ogilvie, has been both condemned and commended at various times by agricultural writers. Prof. Lamson-Scribner, in his book on "Grasses of Tennessee," says:

"In some parts of the eastern and middle states it is abundant in open fields. It is a good grass for hay, but its strong creeping rootstocks, which spread rapidly in all directions, render it one of the worst weeds in cultivated lands, hardly less difficult to eradicate than Johnson grass."

The bulletin quotes a Fayette county, Iowa, farmer on best means of exterminating quack grass. While it is late for this season, it is hardly less suggestive. The farmer says:

"Plow the ground very shallow early in the spring, then harrow until perfectly level, let it lie until about the 25th of June, when the quack grass and other weeds will have reached a large growth. Take three good horses and a 16-inch walking plow, and turn the ground over, plowing as deep as possible, using a heavy log chain attached to plow and whiffletree to pull the growth of vegetation into the furrow, so that it will be completely covered. Sow with buckwheat and harrow lightly with slanting-tooth drag; harrow around the field in the same direction in which it was plowed so as not to uncover any of the vegetation that has been turned under or bring any of the quack grass roots to the surface. If the above treatment of ground that is infested with quack grass is carried out little if any of the weed will be left, and the crop of buckwheat will more than pay for the trouble."

Touching upon a similar line Prof. Pammel is quoted as follows:

"The grass can be exterminated by proper methods of culture and treatment. For the extermination of quack grass the field should be plowed, the rootstocks exposed to the sun by giving the field a thorough harrowing, removed and burned. We should also remember that every severed rootstock of quack grass will give rise to a new plant, hence the importance of having these removed and the importance of preventing the leaves from appearing, as the latter furnish sustenance to the plant. This process of removal must be continued as long as quack grass appears. Various chemical substances have been recommended for its extermination, but so far as I know, none of these are as successful as the hoe and cultivator."

Patience with the Heifer.

Take your time about teaching the heifer to milk. Lots of men are in too big a hurry and they expect too much of the young cows, anyway. It has taken most of us a good many years to learn what we know, and there are some things that we are not altogether posted on, even now.—Farm Journal.

For Use on the Lawn.

For gathering small stones, roots, leaves, etc., from the garden or lawn a box having the top and one side removed is very handy. After the material is raked up in piles, it can be brushed or raked into the box and then emptied. Rope handles nailed to each end are an added improvement.

Give a fresh lot of early-cut clover hay every day, and remove any that is not eaten before more is put in.

Look to the ties on budded trees.

HAY BARN WITH SHEDS.

Instructions for the Erection of the Same—No Cross Ties in the Barn.

In giving information relative to the erection of a hay barn with sheds attached, Joseph E. Wing, in the Breeder's Gazette, says: "Erect the sheds first, on each side of the 24-foot space in the center, then put up the rafters in the middle and you have it. The drawing shows the frame so plainly that any carpenter can or should erect it. The whole is 2x8 stuff except the plates, which are 2x10. The purpose of the long brace in the shed, running from near the foot of the short post, is to carry the thrust of the rafters as near to the ground as possible, seeing that there are no crossties at all in the barn.

"The rafters are all 2x8 inches. I regret that we did not specify that dimension in 'Farm Buildings,' seeing that they cost but little more than lighter ones and nothing more in labor of erecting and are sure proof against any weight of snow. I observe that even moderate sized dwellings have 2x8 rafters in the east.

"Make blocks of concrete for foundation and set each one a three-fourths inch pin that will project through a three-inch block about 10x10 inches. The ends of the posts will then toe nail with spikes nicely to this block. There should be an overhang to shelter the door in the end and the track in the peak. Put in a sling carrier of the strongest make and you will have a good outfit.

"There ought to be a continuous manger along the side and a long chute above it into which hay may be thrown from the mow."

Cement Blocks.

There seems to be a great development of the business of making blocks or stones of sand and cement. It looks like a simple operation, but care must be taken in mixing and packing.

The First Silo.

It is said that Mr. Morris, of Maryland, was the first man in the United States to construct a silo. But it was Gaffart, of France, who first called attention to preserving green crops in an air-tight vessel.

The coolest part of the day is best for picking tomatoes for market. Never handle them while wet with dew or rain.

For a succession, a last sowing of the early table beets may be made.

RECIPES FOR MUSH.

Some Delicious Ones for the Many Delicate Dishes Coming Under This Head.

Rich Cereal.—Cook rolled wheat the evening before needed. Any other cereal may be used. Turn into cups to mold. In the morning put the cups in a steamer over boiling water until hot; unmold and place three or four stoned dates on the top of each mold.

Virginia Mush.—Boil two and one-half quarts of water in iron or porcelain kettle. When boiling hard sprinkle slowly into it one pint sifted cornmeal, stirring constantly. Add two teaspoonfuls salt and boil evenly and slowly for about an hour, when it should be boiled down one-half. Serve with cream and butter. What remains is excellent fried or scalloped with cheese.

Farina Mush.—Put in a kettle one quart fresh milk and a teaspoonful of butter; let it boil; add a scant teaspoonful of salt and stir in a small teacupful of farina; let it slowly sift through the fingers to prevent lumps, stir until as thick as oatmeal mush. Cook 20 minutes and serve with sugar and cream. Ground cinnamon spread over it tastes very good.

Graham Mush.—Stir two cupfuls of graham flour into one quart slightly salted boiling water; boil until thick. Just before removing from fire add one-half cupful each of chopped figs and seedless raisins.

Brawis.—Put through the grinder dried brown bread until you have a large coffeecupful. Stir in a saltspoonful of salt and a scant pint of boiling milk, with a lump of butter the size of a walnut melted in it. Let thicken and serve.

Whole Wheat.—Select a good quality of grain, new if possible; wash through several waters, and boil like rice, in plenty of water, till tender. Drain, and when served heat in a steamer or double boiler, and serve with cream, milk or stewed fruit. Heated in milk, with sugar, spice and raisins, we have furmenty or furmety, still a Christmas dish in some parts of England, and supposed to be the original ancestor of plum pudding.—Rural New Yorker.

EGG-PLANT RECIPES.

May Be Served in Form of Fritters and It Is Very Good Scalloped or Stuffed.

Egg Plant Fritters.—Cut the eggs into slices about a third of an inch thick, pare them and lay in a deep dish with a little salt sprinkled between the slices; pour over them water enough to cover them, turn a plate over the top, put a weight on the plate and let them stand about two hours. This is to draw the bitter water from them. When ready to cook, make a batter with a teacupful of milk, two eggs and flour to make a thin batter. Beat the whites and yolks separately and add the whites last. Take the slices of eggplant from the salt water, dry each one with a cloth, dip them in the batter and fry in very hot fat.

Scalloped Eggplant.—Select medium-sized eggs and boil 20 minutes in salted water enough to cover them. Take them out, cut into halves lengthwise, scoop out the inside, being careful not to break the shells, mash the pulp fine, season with butter, pepper and salt and refill the shells. Sprinkle fine bread crumbs over the tops and set the shells on a pan in the oven and bake until they brown on top. Send to the table in the shells. Or, put the seasoned inside into a pudding dish, cover with bread crumbs and bake as above.

Stuffed Eggplant.—Cut the eggs in halves and leave in salted water one hour; press out all the water you can, wash in fresh water, scoop out the center, leaving the shell about an inch thick. Cut the centers into small dice, peel and cut three tomatoes the same size and mix with the inside of the egg, adding a tablespoonful of melted butter for each half; season with salt, pepper, one-half a teaspoonful of minced onion and a dash of nutmeg. Fill the shells with this, covering with buttered crumbs, set in the oven and bake from 30 to 40 minutes with a moderate heat.

Mayonnaise Sauce.

Carefully strain the yolks of four eggs into a basin, place it in a cool place, or, if necessary, on ice; add a teaspoonful of salt, mix well; then proceed to pour in, a few drops at a time, some salad oil, without ceasing to stir the mixture. When one teaspoonful of oil is well incorporated with the yolks of eggs, put in, in the same manner, a teaspoonful of tarragon vinegar; keep on adding oil and vinegar in these proportions until the sauce becomes of the consistency of very thick cream; then add white pepper to taste, and more salt if necessary.

The Child Asleep.

A little child should never be allowed to go to sleep with its face partly under the bed clothing. Mothers are supposed to know this, but they are often careless. A child's face must be entirely uncovered when asleep so that it inhales only perfectly pure air and not that which has already been breathed. It is trifling things like this which make or mar a child's future health.

Apple Sauce.

Five large apples, two dessert spoonfuls of sugar, a squeeze of lemon juice, one ounce butter. Pare, core and slice the apples; put them in a stewpan with a tablespoonful of water, cover closely, and let them simmer gently till reduced to pulp; beat them with a fork; add the sugar, lemon juice and butter; put into a tureen and serve.

STORMS AT SEA.

In the Arctic regions storms during the winter are unknown. Whatever touches the surface of the ocean may be seen falling from the clouds above, but when it reaches the air beneath the storm is generally absorbed. These storms, however, take place in regions where the thermometer often registers 125 degrees in the shade.

London Zoo Gorilla.

Miss Crowther, the largest and fiercest gorilla ever captured, lately arrived at the London zoological gardens. She is five feet six inches in height, measures 42 inches around the chest and possesses great strength. Occasionally she has fit of rage, but usually she is very shy and hides her face from visitors with her hands.

Captain Death.

An English master mariner named Death has had his name changed. He said, in explanation, that he was now acting as first officer, but expected soon to have command of a ship. He was afraid that few passengers would care about risking a voyage in a ship captained by Death.—Kansas City Times.

Too Much Trousers.

In feudal days Japanese courtiers wore wide trousers twice as long as their legs, so that they trailed after the wearer. Beiasco introduced them in "The Darling of the Gods," but they so convulsed the managerial audience at the first dress rehearsal that literally he had to "cut them out"—and off.

Crown of the Virgin.

The pope has ordered a firm of Florence jewelers to manufacture a crown set with imitation stones for the image of the virgin in the basilica of the vatican, in place of a crown containing gems valued at $7,500,000, which is to be deposited in the vaults of the vatican.

Feminine Comment.

"Here, Maria, here is a story about 80 Buffalo women who cooked on one stove for more than a year and didn't have a single quarrel in all that time."

"What an amiably stupid lot they must have been."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Hard to Down.

When the good man seems to be conquered, the powers of evil have still to rue their shortlived triumph, and to say as Pyrrhus said when he defeated the Romans: "Three such victories would ruin me."—Archdeacon Farrar.

Helping the World.

Make yourself a necessity to the world by what you contribute in the way of personal comfort, by what you are in embodying before men all that is gentle, generous and pure.—M. Dana.

Only a Bluff.

Why does a woman, after making such a solemn promise to obey at the altar, give her husband such a cold and hollow laugh when he merely hints that it would be the proper thing to do?

Old Russ Costumes.

The old local costumes are still worn in many parts of Russia. There is great variety in them, but rich embroidery and an imposing head dress of some sort are common to all.

He—You married me for my money.

She—Well, what if I did? I didn't get it. Isn't that punishment enough?—Detroit Free Press.

OPERATIONS AVOIDED

Two Grateful Letters from Women Who Avoided Serious Operations by Profiting from Like Conditions Will Be Interesting

When a physician tells a woman, suffering from ovarian or womb trouble, that an operation is necessary it, of course, frightens her.

The very thought of the operating table and the knife strikes terror to her heart. As one woman expressed it, when told by her physician that she must undergo an operation, she felt that her death knell had sounded.

Our hospitals are full of women who are there for ovarian or womb operations!

It is quite true that these troubles may reach a stage where an operation is the only resource, but such cases are much rarer than is generally supposed, because a great many women have been cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound after the doctors had said an operation must be performed. In fact, up to the point where the knife must be used to secure instant relief, this medicine is certain to help.

The strongest and most grateful statements possible to make come from women who, by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, have escaped serious operations.

Margrite Ryan, Treasurer of St. Andrew's Society, Hotel English, Indianapolis, Ind., writes of her cures as follows:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I cannot find words to express my thanks for the good Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound did me. The doctor said I could not get well unless I had an operation for ovarian and female troubles. I knew I could not stand the strain of an operation and made up my mind I would be an invalid for life. Hearing how Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound had saved other women from serious operations I decided to try it, and in less than four months I was entirely cured; and words fail to express my thankfulness."

Miss Margret Merkley of 275 3d Street, Milwaukee, Wis., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"Loss of strength, extreme nervousness, severe shooting pains through the pelvic organs, cramps, bearing down pains, and extreme irritation compelled me to seek medical advice. The doctor, after making an examination, said that I had ovarian trouble and ulceration, and advised an operation as my only hope. To this I strongly objected—and I decided as a last resort to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"To my surprise, the ulceration healed, all the bad symptoms disappeared, and I became more strong, vigorous and well; and I cannot express my thanks for what it has done for me."

Ovarian and womb troubles are steadily on the increase among women—and before submitting to any operation every woman should try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and write Mrs. Pinkham at Lynn, Mass. for advice.

For thirty years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been curing the worst forms of female complaints, all ovarian troubles, inflammation, ulceration, falling and displacement of the womb, leucorrhœa, irregularities, indigestion and nervous prostration. Any woman who could read the many grateful letters on file in Mrs. Pinkham's office would be convinced of the efficiency of her advice and Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

YOU NEED SUCH A TONIC

Until Mull's Grape Tonic Was Brought to America, the Following Was Incurable.

READ THESE STATISTICS—WE CAN VERIFY THEM:

90,000 people die yearly from the results of Constipation and Stomach Troubles and their attending ills. Nine in every ten have it. Many don't know it, and a good many who do know it neglect it until it is too late. Some get so bad they think it incurable, and then they resort to the physic or pill habit, where the real trouble begins. You and I know that Pills and Physic make us worse, we become a slave to them, and finally they foul their power and paralysis of the intestines occurs, and then slow death.

Now Constipation and Stomach Troubles are just as curable as any other disease; we have proved this fully by curing over 10,000 the last two years. Many of these were the most chronic, serious, complicated kind in which all other remedies and doctors had failed and hope despaired of, but our treatment cured them quickly and to stay cured.

Mr. Thompson, of Peoria, who had suffered all his life and had given up hope, was cured by 24 bottles. Dr. Dill, of St. Louis, whose health had been broken down, claims that several bottles cured him, that it is a splendid medicine for Stomach and Bowels, and the best general tonic he ever saw. Dr. Hedrick, of Kansas City, who had constipation so badly that he verged upon nervous collapse, says to his great surprise after trying everything else was cured by Mull's Grape Tonic, he says it is the best thing for Stomach and Bowels and kindred ills, that has come to his attention in his professional career. Mrs. Alcoba, of Chicago, who was confirmed invalid for years, after taking a thorough course of Mull's Grape Tonic says she was able to leave her bed after the third bottle, and is now enjoying good health. She tried everything that came to her notice. Mr. Crow, of St. Louis, had dyspepsia, liver and bowel trouble for 35 years, which he contracted during the Civil War. He said he never could get anything that even afforded him relief, but that a short treatment of Mull's Grape Tonic completely cured him. He recommended it to soldiers and many of whom suffer with the same complaint. Mr. McCurdy, of Troy, Ohio, was one of the greatest sufferers that ever came to our attention. There apparently wasn't an organ of his body free from disease: Liver Trouble, Stomach and Kidney Trouble, terrible piles that kept him in agony. Bowels would not act for days, heart action bad, emaciated, run down and completely discouraged. He resorted to every known means, doctors, remedies, baths, etc., all to no avail. He says: "Soon after I started Mull's Grape Tonic my bowels began to act regularly, the pain left me, and my general health built up rapidly. I heartily recommend it as an absolute cure to which I am a living witness."

These are only a few of the very worst cases of the thousands cured by Mull's Grape Tonic.

We can cure you, no matter how bad off and to prove it we will send you without cost a bottle of Mull's Grape Tonic and instructions how to use it. The digestive organs are strangely subject to the curative power of Mull's Grape Tonic.

There is no scheme about this, but a fair, square chance for you to test this grand treatment for yourself, in your own home without cost.

If you have Rheumatism, Stomach, Bowel, Kidney, Lung and Heart Trouble, Indigestion, Dyspepsia, cold, fever, diarrhoea, loss of sleep and strength, run down, Piles, appendicitis, fistula, bad blood, dizziness, bad complexion, etc., remember they are the result of Constipation and Mull's Grape Tonic will cure you. It is a splendid Tonic just as Dr. Dill states. Everybody should use it. Typhoid fever and appendicitis are unknown in families where Mull's Grape Tonic is used. You need such a Tonic, begin to-day.

Don't wait but send now for this free offer and get well. Good for ailing children and nursing mothers.

BASE BALL.

The Boones went to Walton last Sunday, where they were given a first class coat of whitewash. Walton's hired men from Cincinnati "made good," the pitcher making the handsome record of 16 strikeouts. It was one of those games made intensely interesting by the uncertainty of the result until the conclusion of the game. Seven innings of the game were played in drizzling rain, making the ball mean to handle, but, notwithstanding, both teams did nice work. The same teams are to play here next Saturday afternoon. Following is the score of last Saturday's game:

It seems that the late war with Russia has turned Japan's attention to America for a better class of horses to cross upon her own smaller breeds. The purchase also includes four Hackney stallions and two Hackney fillies. The purchase price for the consignment is reported $110,000, or an average of $3,235 per head.

Paul A. Davis, the Rising Sun boot and shoe man, has something to say in these columns this week that is of interest to Boone county people. Kentuckians always meet a cordial welcome at his store whether he sells to them or not.

Merchants, generally, have complained of dull times for the last two or three weeks, owing to the farmers being very busy taking care of a large crop of tobacco, and cutting up corn. They will be ready to make a rush for fall buying in the next few days.

The foot-ball has made its appearance in Burlington, and it need not surprise anybody if they hear of the organizing of a team here in the next few weeks. Capt. Jackson of the Gray base ball team, is a grid-iron expert and will be captian of the aggregation of kickers if a team is organized.

Mary Reitmann has sued Louie Reitmann for $1,200 for malicious shooting, which necessitated the removal of one of her eye-balls. Sheriff was kept busy, last week, serving papers on Louie, who still languishes in jail. His brother, Jake, has also sued him for $1,120 damages. Both suits were filed on September 16th.

A couple of Burlington beaux went calling down on Woolper, not long since, and besides being made seasick by the buggy ride down the creek, one of them was shaken up so badly that his watch and other valuables bounced out of his pocket and were lost. These young men are willing to donate a few days work on that thoroughfare.

The Boone County Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company held its annual election last Monday and elected the following officers: Edgar Cropper, president; Malchus Souther, secretary; N. C. Tanner vice-president; F. A. Utz, treasurer; J. E. Smith, assessor; Solon Early, G. M. Allen, W. T. Smith, O. W. Gaines C. L. Griffith, E. H. Blankenbeker, directors.

An exchange says: "In the latitude of the Middle States, last Tuesday the day and the night were equal 12 hours each. The days will continue to shorten until the 26th of December, when the day will be only 9 hours and 16 minutes. The days will then begin to get longer until about the 20th of March, when the days and nights will be equal again. The longest days in the year are between the 20th and 30th of June, harvest time.

Covington parties have been in Millersburg the past two weeks overseeing the development of the lead mines near there. On the Caldwell farm a valuable vein has been opened with 50 tons of ore extracted which will be shipped to a smelter at Madisonville, Indiana. Expert assayers have tested ... mens of the ore and report 50 per cent lead, a small per cent of silver and a trace of gold. The ore is valued at $25 a ton.—Pendletonian.

Stock breeders, liverymen and owners of horses generally in Hopkinsville and Christian county are greatly alarmed over the appearance in that community of several diseases among stock, which in many cases are proving fatal. There was never known in the State to be such an outbreak of influenza, pink eye and laryngitis as now exists in Christian county. The diseases are so prevalent that most of the livery stables have been closed and there are few horses available for any purpose.

The annual Reunion of the Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, C. S. A., will be held at Glencoe on the 12th of October. The occasion will be one of the most interesting of the kind ever held and a very large attendance is expected. All ex-Confederate and ex-Union soldiers are cordially invited to be present. New features will be introduced forthe entertainment of the old "boys" to make their coming together an occasion of the greatest of pleasure. Speakers of national renown have been invited and will be present.

Mrs. Clarissa Ashley, of Florence, whose serious illness was mentioned last week, died last Wednesday night. Mrs. Ashley was about 84 years old and the last member of her family. She was a sister of Milton and Geo. E. Hamilton and Mrs. Mary Bunyan, all of whom have been dead several years. She was the widow of the late Harman Ashley of Florence. She leaves no children. The remains were brought to Burlington last Friday afternoon, and after a short service at the grave, Rev. Edgar Riley officiating, they were interred in the Hamilton lot in the old cemetery.

Everett Aylor, son of T. B. Aylor, of Limaburg, and Miss Mabel Vest, daughter of County Surveyor W. E. Vest, were married by Rev. T. L. Utz at his residence in Florence, Ky., Wednesday afternoon (Sept. 27.) The groom, who has been in bad health for some time is a most estimable young man, and his friends hope he will soon regain his health. The bride is an accomplished young lady, well calculated to meet all the requirements of a happy and prosperous home, and has been reared in a manner that will enable her to assume domestic duties without their becoming a burden to her. In their new relations Mr. and Mrs. Aylor have the best wishes of a host of friends.

Horace Hewitt, the Aurora sewing machine merchant, stayed in Burlington, last Thursday night. He has a good trade in this territory, which he looks after closely.

Elbert Clore, son of Chas. C. Clore, who lives about three miles out on the East Bend road, and Miss Zelma Kelly, of Waterloo neighborhood, were married by Rev. Slater at the Lutheran parsonage near Florence, last Wednesday afternoon. They were accompanied to the pastor's by Tommie Rice and Miss Nettie Hensley, and Ira Ryle and Miss Jennie Kelly. After the ceremony the bridal party returned to the home of the bride's parents, where the newly married couple was given a hearty reception by quite a number of friends and relatives. On Thursday the home of the groom's parents was the scene of an old time wedding festival, which partook very much of the nature of a delightful family reunion. Elbert is their only child and his father and mother spared no time nor labor to make his homecoming with his bride a noted event in the history of the Clore family, and with that in view a bountiful wedding feast had been prepared, and every member of the family and friends from far and near were summoned to partake thereof and enjoy the pleasure with the father and mother in celebrating the marriage of their son. It was late in the afternoon when the guests began taking their leave, wishing the bride and groom their full share of this life's pleasures and prosperity.

The following presents were received: Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Kelly—berry set and set spoons; Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Clore—to the bride a gold watch, to the groom $20 in gold; J. D. Mrs. Lavenia Patterson, widow of the late Dr. Patterson, died at the home of her niece, Mrs. Louise Riddell, in Burlington, at 11 a. m., last Sunday, aged 78 years, 4 months and 2 days. She had been in feeble health for a long time, but being at the breakfast table that morning and taking part in the conversation, nothing unusual was noticed about her, but in a few hours she began complaining of a peculiar feeling in the back of her neck, then in her spine and limbs. A physician was called but she continued to grow worse until death claimed her. She passed away as a child going to sleep. Mrs. Patterson was the last surviving child of Elijah Garnett, who came from Virginia to this county at an early day, and for a time kept hotel in Burlington. She was married at the age of 21, her husband living only four years, leaving her with two sons. She never married the second time. The greater part of her life was fraught with trials and burdens hard to bear, but she was never heard to murmur because of her lot or to speak evil of anyone. Five times, beginning with the death of her husband, had she been left homeless, but He Who ever watches over the widow and fatherless, provided her and her children with a shelter. Her only descendants are two grandsons Harry and Charlie Patterson, of Covington. The remains of this good woman, whose heart never harbored malice, were taken to Union, yesterday, after a short service by Rev. Edgar Riley, of the Christian church, of which she was a member, and interred in her lot in the cemetery near the town.

Prof. W. P. Dickey under Sept 27, writes to have his Recorder changed to 379 Harvard street, Massachuesetts. He says:

"University opened today without any violent demonstrations except that made by the hundreds of fellows lined up in front of the business office, waiting their turn to get read ... cash. For about a week we meet our several teachers, get orders to buy about a car load of books, and then we will begin the interesting and laborious task of trying to get their contents supplemented by innummerable lectures into our heads. I expect the coming of the Recorder to afford me a happy teaching spell.

Yours Very Truly,
W. P. DICKEY.

Seventy-five years ago the first regular news boat to intercept packet ships for foreign intelligence was put in commission in New York.

An English judge recently altered a sentence to 18 months of hard labor to five years' penal servitude because the prisoner threw a bottle at him.

A prominent Hartford (Conn.) firm of automobile builders has found it necessary to establish a chauffeurs' school in order to get competent men to drive its various cars.

A small new planet of between the ninth and the tenth magnitude has been discovered in the constellation Aquarius by Prof. Goetz, at the Koenigstuhl observatory, near Heidelberg.

In Japan ships are loaded with coal by women and girls; but the work is made comparatively easy by putting the coal in small baskets, which are passed on from one end of a line to the other.

The recently constructed bridge over the Zambesi river at the Victoria Falls is the highest in the world, crossing the gorge below the famous falls at a height of 400 feet, is 650 feet in length, and consists of a main span of 500 feet and two side spans. There are two lines of rails, and the weight of the structure is 1,650 tons. Work was commenced in October, 1904, and the bridge was linked up on April 1, this year.

Concealed somewhere in the old Presbyterian church at Fairton, Pa., there is said to be a bottle of whisky at least 100 years old. When the edifice was being built, it is said, the workmen struck for whisky, which in those days seemed to be a necessity. A quart was furnished them, but according to Hosea Husted, then an apprentice, the liquor was so "ornery" that the men couldn't drink it, but buried it in the walls. Robert Wescoat, who relates the incident, says the bottle is still there.

Automobile manufacturers in this country made a fine showing during the fiscal year 1905 in the way of foreign trade, the exports reaching the high-water mark of $2,481,243. Last year the exports were valued at $1,895,605, and the year before at $1,207,065. The greatest foreign shipments in any one month in the history of the American automobile export trade were those in June last, when the value reached $313,499. In June a year ago the value was only $181,798.

In discussing ways and means to increase our trade with South America, Special Agent Lincoln Hutchinson, writing to the state department from Rio de Janeiro, expresses his opinion that the mail service with this country is in urgent need of improvement. This, he declares, is very inadequate, and its improvement would stimulate our sales. Many of the larger dealers send their orders by cable, and are thus independent of the mails. But the smaller firms are not able to do this.

The picture-card craze has struck this country hard. Every town and village has come to have its "set" of views, and this is a large country with many communities. We are a rich and free-spending people, and purchase of cards figures as a trifle. In consequence the mails are crowded with them, and the government does not mind, so long as the cards are decent, for it gets about one dollar and twenty cents a pound for carrying them, whereas the average payment for all other sorts of matter is but eight cents per pound.

It seems practically certain that in the provisions which he has announced for a new legislative assembly in Russia, time will prove that the czar has builded better than he knew. The constitution of the Duoma, as this assembly is called, is not more remarkable for what it grants to the people than for what it expressly withholds. It actually deprives the emperor of little, if any, of the power he now possesses; he is still the beginning and the end of all law and authority. The Duoma may be dissolved at any time by the emperor.

It is estimated that an ounce of radium would contain enough power to raise 10,000 tons a mile above the earth's surface. Another way of stating the same estimate was that the energy needed to tow a ship of 12,000 tons a distance of 6,000 sea miles at 15 knots was contained in 22 ounces of radium. Now, we knew that the earth contains radio-active materials, and it was safe to assume that it does in some degree a sample of the materials of the solar system, hence it was almost certain that the sun is radio-active also.

TO WORK ON CANAL.

Martinique Laborers Refused to Disembark at Colon.

Later 500 of Them Were With Difficulty Persuaded To Land—The Balance Were Forcibly Ejected From the Steamer.

Colon, Oct. 2.—Six hundred and fifty laborers from Martinique, brought here Friday on the French steamer Versailles, under contract to work on the canal, refused to disembark or to submit to vaccination, which is imperative under the American sanitary regulations. They clamored to be taken back to Martinique, asserting that they had been misinformed as to the conditions here before they embarked and that later they learned these conditions were intolerable and deadly.

Saturday morning, however, 500 of them were with difficulty persuaded to land and these were sent to points along the line of the canal. One hundred and fifty remained on board and declined to leave the ship under any consideration. These were forcibly ejected from the vessel Sunday afternoon by Panaman and canal zone policemen, but not until nearly every one of them had been clubbed and several were bleeding from nasty wounds. All of Saturday and Saturday night the Versailles was guarded by Panaman policemen.

Perhaps, while I stood talking with some one, this trembling of the limbs, and profuse sweating, and a severe chill would seize me. Marriage at Shechem

Lesson for May 6, 1900. Text of the Lesson, Gen. 33:18-20. Memory Verses, 19, 20. Golden Text, Ps. 37:5. Commentary Prepared by the Rev. D. M. Stearns. [Copyright, 1900, by D. M. Stearns.]

Synopsis.—"And Jacob journeyed to Succoth, and built him an house, and made booths for his cattle; therefore the name of the place is called Succoth. And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem, which is in the land of Canaan, when he came from Padan-aram; and pitched his tent before the city. And he bought a parcel of a field, where he had spread his tent, at the hand of the children of Hamor, Shechem's father, for an hundred pieces of money. And he erected there an altar, and called it El-elohe-Israel."—Gen. 33:17-20.

TWO men seated on their rugs spread before the tent door are engaged in earnest conversation. The late afternoon sun creeping underneath the sheltering canopy has reached at last the head of the elder man and lighted up with a rare splendor the silver gray of the flowing locks. The face is in the shadow, but it can be seen that it is a goodly face, in which are traceable the marks of discipline and sorrow, such as sometimes come in the later years of life, as though they would exact a tardy recompense for the peace and prosperity and smiling skies which have crowned the years of the earlier life. Although the form is bent and the poise and vigor of manhood's prime have departed, still it can be seen that the clean, wholesome living of the earlier years has left as a worthy legacy a preserved and splendid old age. As he speaks the head is slightly averted so as to bring the ear rather than the eyes opposite his companion, for he is blind, and the sense of hearing must be alert and in a measure recompense for the loss of sight.

"Jacob," he is saying, "it is good to hear how graciously the Lord hath dealt with thee during all these years. I knew He would lead thee back to the land which hath been promised to Abraham and his seed. But why tarriest thou on the very border of thine inheritance? Why shouldst thou not dwell in the places which thy father Isaac and thy father's father Abraham knew before thee?"

"I have all I need for my flocks and herds, father. What shall it profit me to go elsewhere?"

"But shouldst not thy feet traverse the length and breadth of the land which is to become the possession of thy children?"

"Oh, I am weary of the journey, and who knows what trials and perils one may encounter on the way?" was the somewhat impatient response.

Jacob had made the long journey from Succoth to Beersheba, where his father still continued to dwell, in response to the urgent message which the old man Isaac had sent to his son when tidings had reached him that the long absent boy had departed from Syria with all his substance and had again entered Canaan. It was a sad home-coming for Jacob, for the loving, indulgent mother was not there to give him welcome. Some years before she had died, and Isaac with streaming eyes and broken voice told of this, the crowning sorrow of his life and of his loneliness since she had gone from him.

"Her heart yearned after thee, Jacob. She longed to see thee before she died, but she dared not send for thee because Esau was not yet gone to Edom, and she knew not whether the bitterness had died out of his heart. I wish she could have known of thy reconciliation with thy brother. It takes the one burden from my heart, and now I can die in peace when God shall so will."

The old man paused, and, reaching out his hands, he felt in the uncertain manner of the blind until they rested on the arm of his son, and then continued, earnestly:

"Remembered thou the blessing with which I blessed thee when thou didst depart from Padan-aram?"

"That the blessing of Abraham should be mine, and that I and my seed should inherit the land which God gave to Abraham," Jacob responded, fervently.

"Yea, I see that thou hast not forgotten," and a pleased expression lighted up the grizzled face of the old man. "And the last message which thy mother left for thee was this: 'Tell Jacob not to forget that the Lord hath spoken good concerning him, and that He will fulfill all His promises spoken to Abraham and to Isaac.'"

"Forget!" earnestly exclaimed Jacob. "Was it not the memory of God's blessing that kept me patient and faithful during all the long hard service under Laban? And had not God been with me, I had returned empty handed."

"God hath shown thee great mercies, and hath blessed thee in thy return. But be not content to dwell at Succoth, for there are better experiences and greater blessings as thou dost enter more fully into the land God hath promised thee."

This last earnest admonition kept ringing in the ears of Jacob as he took leave of his father the next day and started on the long journey home.

"I'm glad I did not tell father that I had built [illegible] at Succoth," he [illegible] within sight of [illegible] recalled how with [illegible] had planned to [illegible] was forced to ad-

[illegible] pondered his father's last [illegible] that he must not be satisfied [illegible] present attainment, and that [illegible] was to possess the full blessing [illegible] he must go forward in faith and [illegible]. "And I will," he vowed at last after an inward struggle. But as he resolved thus to walk with God where He should lead, he did not realize the opposition and difficulties which were to confront him. He had not yet fully learned that the choosing of a right course was only the vestibule to higher attainment and that it took courageous faith and the earnest conviction of a settled purpose to go steadfastly forward in spite of the obstacles encountered in the way.

"Why should they go?" was the united protest. "Was not the location delightful? and did they not have all that the heart could wish?"

"But I would go to Bethel, there to pay my vows to the Lord Who met me in that place as I fled from this land and promised me His blessing. He has brought my feet thither again, and I must needs return to Bethel."

Rachel was the first to yield to the earnest pleading, and the others soon gave reluctant consent to depart, and a few days later found Jacob proceeding southward with his flocks and herds and all that he had. But as they drew near to Shalem, a city of Shechem, Jacob listened to the entreaties and consented to rest there for a season. But what he had intended should be only a short respite from the journey lengthened into the months, and the months soon completed the sum of a year. He had not intended that it should be so, but as is so often the case when one dallies with duty and tarries by the wayside, he gradually forgot his high purpose and the place for which he had set out, and though it did occasionally trouble him, as the better promptings came, he dismissed them with the promise that soon he would depart.

"Better remain while trade is so good. We can go to Bethel later," advised Reuben, the eldest son, and with him the others agreed, and Jacob, after a half-hearted protest, yielded.

"And to-morrow there is to be a festivalin the town," Reuben continued. "There will be a big demand for the finest of the cattle and the sheep for the sacrifices and the feasting. How foolish it would be not to make the most of it."

Jacob's brow clouded. The best of his cattle and sheep for sacrifice to the heathen gods, and for the feasting of those who bowed down to them? But his protests were quieted by the promise of the rich gain which would be theirs, and the next day he watched as his sons departed, trying to quiet his troubled conscience with the thought that the tenth of all his increase would be the Lord's. At the last moment Dinah, after much pleading, had won his consent to go with the boys and witness the merry-making.

Not many days after this Hamor, the prince of the country and the ruler of Shalem, came with his son Shechem to visit Jacob, with the ostensible purpose of offering him a permanent dwelling place there, but the real reason was that the young man Shechem had seen Dinah at the feast and, becoming enamored of her, resolved that she should become his wife. But his advances had been so rebuffed by the brothers that he had realized that only by subtlety could he obtain his desires. On appealing to his father, the latter had thought to win Jacob's favor by the offer of land.

"Nay, I will not accept thy land except I pay thee its value," replied the wary Jacob. "What is thy price?"

"A hundred pieces of silver would but be its worth, but what is that between thee and me? Take the land."

And Jacob weighed unto him the hundred pieces of silver, and while they were thus engaged with the business in hand Shechem found opportunity to speak to the winsome Dinah, and her heart had gone out to the handsome, noble-looking Hivite. She knew the abhorrence with which her people looked upon alliance with the uncircumcised Canaanites, but secretly she resolved that she would favor Shechem's suit. And Jacob, all unconscious of the shame and sorrow which was gathering like a thick cloud about his home, continued to dwell in contentment before Shalem. Bethel unattained, and the sacrifices he had intended to make there still unoffered, he sought to find comfort in the erection of an altar to his God at Shechem. He would offer his sacrifices there. Would it not do just as well after all as if he were at Bethel? Summoning all the family and the servants to gather on a certain day for the appointed service he prepared to worship his God. Instinctively he felt that the influence of the people of Shalem upon his family was not of the best, but he tried to persuade himself that the building of the altar and the offering of sacrifice would somehow make things come out all right. But even while he was offering sacrifice and speaking to his family and servants of his God, the God of Israel, in memory of the new name which God had given him, Dinah, enticed by the attractions of the town, and finding opportunity during the confusion attendant upon the service, had slipped away to visit with some of the damsels of the town whom she had met at the festival and on her subsequent visits thither. Sacrifice and worship could not stay the consequences of tarrying at Shechem. Altars by the wayside could not take the place of the altar at Bethel, as Jacob was to learn by the dishonoring of his daughter and the bloody vengeance which the enraged brothers were to wreak upon the people of Shalem. With what tragic memories would Jacob recall his tarrying at Shechem!

WORK FOR THE PRESIDENT

Something Lively in Store When the Lawmakers Get Together Again.

Now the excitement of the peace negotiations has subsided at Oyster Bay things look dull, if not blue, around there. But when President Roosevelt arrives in Washington he will find many things to settle that will amuse him until he has congress on his hands. When congress is in session, it is noticeable that President Roosevelt becomes more than usually strenuous, if not irritable and choleric. He is quite likely to take an irreconcilable position and talk testily to those who do not agree with him.

The railroads, the trusts, the tariff beneficiaries and all the hosts of monopolists are disappointed at the early close of the peace negotiations. As long as the president was playing with foreign affairs he had less time to devote to home matters and to "stir up trouble."

The republican leaders in congress have it all planned with their corporation friends to "let well enough alone," push the appropriation bills to an early vote, adjourn and appeal to the country as the party of prosperity. Meddling with tariff schedules and cutting railroad rates would in the minds of these worthies, enlightened by corporation advocates, destroy prosperity and perhaps precipitate a panic, if it would pay the Wall street interests to have one.

But where will this do nothing policy leave President Roosevelt? He stands for "doing things" and the American people are looking to him to recommend congressional action in no mealy-mouthed fashion.

Foreign affairs, Mr. President, will take care of themselves, as far as this country is immediately interested, so please turn your attention to what is of vastly more importance to most of us, the live questions of reduction of trust high prices and the control of railroad rates and other plundering corporation devices.

THE HANDWRITING SEEN.

Republicans Advised by Organs to Revise the Tariff.

Pittsburg, the hot-bed of protection, is too smart not to see where she is drifting. That stanch republican organ, the Pittsburg Gazette, advises the republicans to veer from the protection course and thus allay the growing sentiment everywhere for tariff reform. Just listen to this from the original home of the steel trust:

"In this broad country, with its abounding prosperity, there are unmistakable signs of unrest. The common people, grown rotund with fatness, have forgotten the lean years and are demanding a change in the tariff law. There is no better time than the present to undertake this revision. This Fifty-ninth congress of the United States is peculiarly fitted for the task and ought to perform the duty. Revise the tariff now and then let it alone for the next ten years."

But that kind of a tariff revision will not satisfy the people, for the tariff will never be "revised by its friends," so as to stop the plundering of trusts The corporations have such a firm hold of the republican leaders in the coming congress that the protective league even proposes to "revise the tariff higher." We will have to await still another congress, the Sixtieth, and it will be necessary for the democrats to have a majority for real reform to be accomplished.

NOTES FOR POLITICIANS.

—The Chicago beef packers have succeeded in postponing their trial and Secretary Moody is sitting in the palm garden at the Auditorium trying to explain how it happened. In the meantime George W. Beavers is still at large, though he was indicted two or three years ago. The department of justice needs to wake up and "do things."

—It is intimated that when the other big life insurance companies are investigated there will be more disastrous disclosures for their policyholders than those the Equitable have had to endure. These savings banks, for that is what they are, must be divorced from the railroad interests that control Wall street, or they will be wrecked, as other corporations have been to build up fortunes for individuals.

—The first business the United States senate should do upon meeting is to declare vacant the seats of all senators convicted of crime. The senate is the judge of the election and qualification of its members, and if it wishes to preserve its credit for being the greatest legislature body on earth, and beyond reproach, it should clear its seats of corruptionists without fear or favor. The republican party, which controls the senate, cannot afford to shelter those who have been proven guilty in open court, and it should not expect the democratic minority to make the first move by introducing the resolution for expulsion.

—If that largest searchlight in the world had been installed at Washington instead of Pike's peak, it might do better service by being turned on the republican grafters who have possession of the government departments than on the majestic scenery of the Rockies.

—The coal trust has made another raise of ten cents a ton, which makes 50 cents a ton in all this summer, and in spite of the cool weather, which demands an outlay for fall clothes, we will have to see the raise, and probably another before the trust will consent to fill our coal bins.

THE REPUBLICAN FIGHT.

The Stand-Patters and Dual Tariff Advocates Keep Things Warm.

The two tariff factions of the republican party do not seem to be uniting for the newly proposed dual tariff, judging by the actions of their respective champions. The advocates of the Iowa idea, that the tariff fosters trusts and therefore should be revised, were pretty effectually smothered last year, as far as political results are concerned, though the ardor of its defenders, the revisionists, do not appear to be dampened. Gov. Cummins, who is the most prominent republican tariff reformer, has just fallen foul of Secretary Shaw and has demolished that economic chaiatan by quoting him out of his own mouth. Secretary Shaw challenged a statement made by Gov. Cummins in an address delivered before the national reciprocity conference at Chicago, in which he said the secretary of the treasury in a speech at Des Moines declared that the refusal of the senate to consider the French reciprocity treaty was because "it gives everything to France and nothing to the United States." Secretary Shaw denied that he said the words "quoted," "or anything that could be so interpreted." But Gov. Cummins comes back at him from an editorial in the Des Moines Capital, a Shaw stand-patter organ, which substantially proves his contention. Secretary Shaw will probably try and creep out of the mess he is in, for that is his usual method.

But the main point is the fact that this intense feeling between the leaders of the rival factions in Iowa is equally rampant elsewhere and cannot be smothered before the campaign for electing congressmen is under way next summer. That will be the golden opportunity for the democrats, they should nominate their strongest and most able champions of tariff reform and make tariff revision the main issue. There will be quite a percentage of republican and independent voters who will welcome the opportunity to read the republican [illegible] patters a lesson and give the [illegible] magnates and their tariff fostered high prices a dig under the fifth rib that will let daylight in on their preposterous profits.

A good many people besides democrats have become tired of the greatly increased cost of living, without any compensating advantage.

SUSTAINS THE DEMOCRATS

Protection Figures Are Shown to Be Out of Line with the Party's Claims.

Again the position of the democrats has been sustained, and this time officially, on the increased cost of living. During the last campaign, and in fact for six years, the bureau of labor under Carrol D. Wright issued its bulletin, explaining, with a mass of juggled figures, how the cost of living and the average wages had increased in about the same proportion. The democrats asserted and proved by unimpeachable facts and figures that prices for the [illegible] of life had risen about 40 per cent., while wages had only slightly increased. Now the bureau of labor issues another bulletin and admits that the cost of living is largely in excess of three or four years ago, while wages have not correspondingly increased.

It has not been necessary to inform those with small incomes that it costs more to live now than formerly, the housewife in millions of homes knows that too well, she and the breadwinners also know if their income has kept pace with the outgo. It is an outrage, however, that a bureau created to assist labor should have, for evident partisan purposes, continued giving out false and juggled figures to help prove that the protective tariff, with its fostered trusts and their high prices, was an advantage to those who work for a living. The protective tariff, itself, has not directly increased the cost of some articles, but it has fostered the trusts and a general era of extravagance and high prices, with which most incomes find it difficult to cope.

Roosevelt Doesn't Worry.

"The president does not worry," says a friend of his. Of course President Roosevelt does not worry; why should he? He lets the other fellow pace the floor and fret. He has a good income, besides his salary, and has everything at his command to make life desirable. The fellow who worries is the man with the limited income, who feels the full force of trust high prices, without the corresponding increase of the wherewith to pay his bills. The great majority of the American people have cause to worry, they pay the tariff and trust tax that "protection to American industry" allows the favored few to plunder them of, and they also pay the unreasonable railroad rates with no address. The farmer, the small tradesmen and the workingmen and their families, are the ones who worry and as long as the present system is continued they will find no relief.

—It is now declared that Gov. Cummins has licked the Iowa standpatters to a standstill, but perhaps it will be well to see how deep the "Iowa idea" has been pounded into the congressional delegation before such good news is taken in large doses.

—The divinely appointed custodian of the coal trust, Baer, insists that Cain was the first striker. Perhaps Tubal Cain was the head of the first iron and [illegible] combine and Noah had a monopo[illegible] the shipping trust when the demand for free ships was very urgent.

FROM ALL OVER THE STATE

ROCKEFELLER AND OTHERS.

They Purchased Vast Tracts of Coal Lands in Kentucky.

Whitesburg, Ky., Sept. 30.—Ten thousand acres of mountain lands lying along the proposed Louisville Southern extension in Upper Harlan county, south of here, were purchased by an eastern syndicate, with John D. Rockefeller at its head. The price paid was $40 per acre. It is the intention of the corporation to build a 35-mile extension of the Louisville & Nashville, from Asher's lumber yards, on the Cumberland Valley division, up the Cumberland valley to the coal property. There is much industrial activity in the whole of Eastern Kentucky.

Troops accompanied Fletcher to Russellville in August last for trial. The jury disagreed. Both he and Lyon are in jail at Bowling Green for safekeeping.

Some Mean Thief Picked the Pockets of Rev. Sam Jones.

Bowling Green, Ky., Sept. 30.—Rev. Sam P. Jones, the evangelist, who came here Friday morning to inaugurate the Bowling Green Chautauqua, had his pocket picked in less than 15 minutes after his arrival. He lost $15. The Chautauqua will last through October 9. Rev. James Small, the evangelist, closed a revival here, and will leave for Cincinnati, where he will be in charge of a service at the First Presbyterian church.

Breeding Nominated.

Sergent, Ky., Sept. 26.—By order of District Chairman L. W. Fields the republicans of Letcher and Knott counties met in mass convention in Whitesburg and instructed for John W. Breeding, of Knott county, for representative from this (the Ninety-seventh) district. John W. Wicker, of Floyd county, is the democratic nominee.

Accident on a Race Track.

Louisville, Ky., Sept. 27.—Brancas, at 8 to 5 won the Old Inn handicap, the feature at Churchill Downs. Haviland, an equal favorite, was never prominent. Mr. Rose, Prince Real and Golden Link fell in the steeplechase and Prince Real and Mr. Rose were killed, each animal having sustained a broken leg. Jockey Garis was badly hurt.

Conen, 22, a French horn player in the United States Marine band, was shot in the back by Mrs. Jennie L. May, 32, the wife of Ole J. May, a fellow musician. Conen formerly lived in Louisville, Ky.

A Fatal Fall.

New Castle, Ky., Sept. 27.—Miss Lizzie McGinnis, of this place, was buried, having died from the effects of falling down two steps at the door of her room a few days ago. Her brother, Dr. I. W. McGinnis, the only male member of the family, is at the exposition at Portland, Ore.

Frankfort, Ky., Sept. 27.—At a session of the state fiscal court, Judge R. L. Stout ordered judgment entered in favor of the commonwealth against the L. & N. Railroad Co. for sums aggregating $12,206, claimed by the state to be due as penalty and interest on franchise taxes.

Special Judge Appointed.

Paducah, Ky., Sept. 29.—Gov. Beckham appointed Judge B. W. Bradburn, of Bowling Green, as special judge to try the Walter Holland murder case at Benton, Judge Ell Brown, who tried the case at the last term of court, having resigned.

Barbourville, Ky., Sept. 30.—The contract has been let for the construction of the new building for the First Methodist church and work will begin immediately. The building will cost about $8,000 when completed.

SALE OF THOROUGHBREDS.

The Largest Ever Held in the World Will Take Place Next December.

Lexington, Ky., Sept. 29.—The greatest sale of thoroughbreds ever held in the world will take place in December in New York, when Rancho Del Paso stud, the largest of breeding establishments, will be disposed of at public auction. News of the determination of J. B. Haggin to sell his California property was wired to Charles Berryman, manager of his Elmendorf stud here. Thirty-five stallions and over 600 brood mares and a lot of young stuff will be offered. Among the famous stallions are: Imp. Watercress, Imp. Star Ruby, Imp. St. Gatlan, Imp. Gold Finch, Imp. Golden Garter, Sir Madrid, Imp. Toddington, Glenheim, Maxio, Gold Spinner and others. The brood mares include the most famous matrons of breeding animals. The interests which Haggin will sell have for more than a decade played a more conspicuous part in turf history than any other in America. In the ranks winners of more than $100,000 on the American turf are more from Rancho Del Paso paddocks than from any other establishment. Its annual yearling sales run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. The sale will not affect the Kentucky interests of Mr. Haggin.

HANGED HIMSELF.

He Told His Wife He Would Never Take the Wagon Back.

Louisville, Ky., Sept. 28.—"I'll never take that wagon back to the stable," said John J. Donahue to his wife, and straightway went out to the barn in the rear of his home and hanged himself. An hour later he was found dangling at the end of a piece of wire by his brother-in-law, Charles Baisch. What prompted the awful act is not known, as the man had never complained of his lot in life. Until Tuesday he seemed well to be in excellent spirits, and he always enjoyed good health. Donahue was employed as a driver by the Armour Packing Co.

OUT OF COURT.

Two Prominent Men Arrested For Settling a Tax Suit.

Lexington, Ky., Sept. 28.—Former State Revenue Agent A. M. Harrison and Edward Odor, a prominent broker and former life assurance man, were arrested here on warrants from Clark county requiring them to give bond to answer to the Clark circuit court to grand jury indictments charging them with defrauding the state by settling a back tax suit out of court. It is alleged that they took $1,000 from W. R. Thomas, manager of the Ford Lumber Co., and had entered a judgment for $6,000 taxes, instead of $30,000, as claimed by assessor of Clark county.

JOHN F. FARRIS.

The Well Known Race Horse Trainer Shot To Death.

Stanford, Ky., Sept. 27.—John F. Farris, the race horse trainer, was shot to death by R. E. Lee Sims, owner of several thoroughbred horses and for whom Mr. Farris trained a two year old. ANCIENT FAMILY

Whose Descendants Are Widely Scattered Through The States

To the Editor of the Recorder:

I wish to say a few words about some of the oldest settlers of America, knowing that in so doing I will interest not one, but many of your readers in Ky. and near-by states. Among those who came to this country from England in the days of Lord Baltimore was one Joseph Hedges, who settled in Maryland and who figured to some extent in the local history of that commonwealth at the time I have put down. Descended from an old and wealthy English family, he fetched with him to the new world many household effects, such as tapestries, china, silverware, pictures, books, and such like, which at that time were rare in this country, together with some 10,000 or 20,000 pounds. He invested his money in land in Maryland and Pennsylvania At one time at an early day he owned about 1,000 acres of land near Monoquacy, Md., where he built a house modeled after the manor houses of England. He died in 1732, leaving a widow and nine children surviving him. The children settled in Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois and in other states of the union and their descendants now number probably over 1,500 persons.

Charles Hedges, the eldest of the sons, died in Frederick County, Maryland, December 12, 1795, aged 83 years, his immediate survivors being a widow and 14 children, one of them, Charles Hedges, Jr., settling in Brooke County, Virginia, his descendants being to-day among the prominent people of the nation. Josiah Hedges, of Tiffin, Ohio, founder of that place, and Hon. Henry C. Hedges, of Mansfield, O., were among his descendants, as in fact, are a score of the good citizens living in different parts of the Buckeye State. The late Dr. T. W. Hedges, of Cynthiana, Ky.; Meredith Hedges, of Maysville, Ark.; Alonzo Hedges, Postmaster, Charleston, Ark.; Z. T. Hedges, Little Rock, Ark., and others residing in Delaware, Ohio, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere, whom I have not space to mention, are likewise descendants of Charles Hedges, Jr.

Many of the non perishable articles brought across the sea by Joseph Hedges, founder of this particular branch of the Hedges family in the United States, are still preserved as heirlooms by his descendants. Zachary T. Hedges, of Little Rock, Ark., has in his possession nine silver spoons and a set of china of eighteen pieces, the set originally numbering fifty odd pieces, which were once the property of Joseph Hedges. This china was manufactured in France, is of lavender color, the edges heavily inlaid with gold leaf, each piece being embellished with an exquisite painting. There are coffee and tea urns, sugar and berry bowls and five cups and saucers, all in very good state of preservation. The spoons are large dinner-sized, quaintly marked with the letter "H" on the front of each. Another set of china, once the property of Joseph Hedges, and which is of robin-blue color, made in Saxony, is in possession of a descendant in Deleware or Pennsylvania. Besides these are some small oil paintings in silver frames. These latter style of frames were in use in England in the time of Queen Elizabeth. The will of Joseph Hedges is among the records in the Office of Register of Wills, Ann Arundel County, Maryland, and is dated September 6th, 1732. It is a quaint document. The bequests therein consist for the most part of landed property, the testator having a large and valuable estate to hand down to his heirs. The sons, Charles and Solomon, are named as executors, and implicit directions are given them as to the manner of dividing the estate between the children. No bond is required, the testator relying fully on the honesty of the executors.

In 1681 Joseph Hedges raised an unusually good crop of tobacco. This product was exported, the principal market being England. The family may justly take the place among the oldest, if not the most widely known in the United States. MRS. MARY P. HEDGES.

The school is progressing nicely, and with better facilities better work will be done.

Idlewild says: "If a husband desires his wife to be beautiful, he should be careful to not worry her, as it mars her beauty to be worried." It is true worry mars beauty, and too much of it will cause those abominable wrinkles that no wrinkle eradicator will remove, and bring on premature old age. Perhaps if a wife would not worry her husband, he too would be better looking, and better dispositioned.

Walton had the advantage of Erlanger of about 10-lbs. average, although Erlanger did fine playing. The game was played in 15 and 20 minute halves.

Touchdowns—Watson 3, Florence 1, Clemonds 1, Craig 2, Stephens 1.

Touchback—Florence 1.

Tackles—Richey 2, Adams 2, Laythorp 3, Huey 2, Stephens 5.

Every man on the Walton team did excellent playing, not a chance being lost, except one which was a fumble between Clemonds and Watson, which resulted in a touchdown in favor of Erlanger by Stephens. WAGES WARFARE ON MARRIAGE STATE

Prof. Herron Declares Present Laws and Customs Neither Sacred Nor Good.

"COMPANION'S" FORTUNE TO AID HIS CAUSE

Former Congregational Minister to Establish a Colony of His Believers in New Jersey—Divorces Lawful Wife for Another Woman—Strong Denunciation by Rev. Dr. Hillis.

Grinnell, Ia.—Prof. George D. Herron, for several years a professor of applied Christianity at Grinnell college, the Iowa Congregational institution, is at present engaged in waging warfare upon the present system of marriage and upon present-day religion. He is writing a book setting forth his peculiar beliefs and in the near future intends to establish a colony of believers in his doctrine on his farm at Metuchen, N. J., and to spend time his propaganda throughout the world.

Doctrine of Prof. Herron.

Prof. Herron first startled the orthodox Congregationalists, in which denomination he was a minister, by the following statements:

"I do not believe that the present marriage system is sacred or good.

"I believe that union is made by love alone and that it is terminable at the termination of love.

"Love marries us and, as long as our love lasts, love will keep us together.

"I think it wrong to obey a law that would keep us together when love has ended.

"We no longer have a religion. Our movement supplies all the spiritual needs of a religion. Human life must become its own religion and human labor must become its own ritual and scripture.

"The modern world is practically without religion. Fires on old altars are dying out. Religious authority has been outgrown. All notions of right and wrong are being scrutinized. We all need the era work of infinite saving."

It was not long after this that Prof. Herron told his wife that he had ceased to love her and persuaded her to seek a divorce. He then took Miss Carrie Rand, one of his followers and professor of history of about $1,500 a year as his companion."

Recent death of the mother of Miss Rand, who was an ardent disciple of the professor, has left another fortune estimated at $1,500,000 which she has given him full authority to spend in promulgating his theories on marriage.

Possesses a Fanatic Spirit.

Prof. Herron is without doubt the most prominent Christian socialist in America. He is of a type that is common enough in England, but his peculiar notions of the rich man and his duties to society have aroused a fanatic spirit in him that has made him a leader of men. Prof. Herron was pastor of a small church in an obscure town in Minnesota. He was called to be the assistant pastor of the Congregational church at Burlington, Ia., and his ministry there was very successful. He was installed in Burlington in 1891, and from that time his name became nationally famous. In 1893 Dr. Herron was made professor of applied Christianity in Iowa college (Congregational), which was endowed for him by Mrs. E. D. Rand, of Burlington, whose daughter, Carrie, has since inherited the Rand millions, and who has turned them over to her "companion."

After seven years of service in the college, during which time the chair of applied Christianity in general, and Prof. Herron in particular, were the objects of constant and bitter attack, the professor sent in his resignation. He did this only after Mrs. Rand had agreed that the $35,000 with which she had endowed the special chair should not be taken away from the college.

Couple Becomes Companions.

Miss Rand became the professor's "companion" under peculiar circumstances. Her mother, a widow with unlimited means, became a member of the professor's cult, after she heard him declare that he did not believe that the present marriage system is sacred or good. She encouraged her own daughter in this belief, with the result that Prof. Herron's home was broken up, he deserted his wife and four children which he brought into the world, and took up his residence with Miss Rand, calling her his "companion."

The Herrons and the Rands were fast friends. Mrs. Herron knew and loved Carrie Rand, who has supplanted her in the affections of her husband, and the young woman was a frequent visitor at the Herron home, hence the shock to Mrs. Herron when upon returning from a European trip she learned for announced to her that he had ceased to love her, and invited her to institute proceedings for a divorce.

Rumor of Marriage.

It is said of the pair that in New York, prior to the death of Mrs. Rand, Prof. Herron and Miss Rand were married by a professor of Columbia university, but this is denied by friends of the professor.

At a meeting held in the First Congregational church of Grinnell on the 21st of June, 1901, to consider the right of church membership and ministerial standing of George D. Herron, the following findings were rendered:

"That the charge of immoral and unchristian conduct is sustained by the findings of the court which at Algona, on March 21, 1901, granted a decree of divorce to Mary Everhard Herron from her husband on the grounds of desertion and inhuman treatment.

"Resolved, That we recommend to the Grinnell association that the name of George D. Herron be dropped from its roll of membership.

"Resolved, That we recommend to the First Congregational church of Grinnell that the name of George D. Herron be dropped from its roll of membership.

"Resolved, That we express our conviction that George D. Herron has forfeited all right to be known by the churches of our faith and order as a minister of the Gospel and that he is by vote of this council deposed from the Christian ministry."

It was the intention of the committee of the Grinnell church to show that Dr. Herron had no excuse for leaving his wife save those contained in the sophistries of his late arguments on marriage and divorce. Eight women, most of them wives of professors at Grinnell college or teachers in that institution, told the assembled churchmen what the home life of Mrs. Herron had been during the past seven years that she lived in Grinnell, struggling with the heart agony which came from the growing knowledge that her husband was becoming estranged from her. She saw all the bright hopes she had formed in the days when they were college mates at Ripon, Wis., fading away one by one. She saw the influence of Mrs. Rand and her daughter growing stronger week by week and still she bravely kept up the fight and strove to win her husband back to her, confident, as one of the women testified, that her love was so strong for him that in the end it would triumph.

Not Pleased with Colony.

Nothing has ever stirred the quiet village of Metuchen to such indignation as the reports that have been circulated from time to time of the progress toward building up a socialistic colony on the Herron property.

The people of Metuchen, whose characteristics have been modesty and retirement, have been unanimous in letting Prof. Herron and his friends severely alone. This policy of non-intercourse has given the comings and goings of Prof. Herron and the Rands an air of mystery.

The character of the improvements which have been made at such great cost on the farms purchased with the late Mrs. Rand's money have every indication of a purpose to provide for an extensive colony. The nucleus of this colony is already on the place. A number of sympathizers with Prof. Herron's beliefs live in the different cottages at Elmwood farm.

Regular services are held in a kind of open air temple, which has been built at considerable expense next to the Herron residence.

Views Meet Disapproval.

A rain of disapproval of his conduct has been showered upon Prof. Herron. Several months ago he was [illegible] been the guest of the Detroit [illegible] to dining with him. One [illegible] private life should have a [illegible] the value of his views. Dr. Hillis several months ago expressed hearty approval of a speech of Dr. Herron's, and Dr. Herron's views have not changed since then. If it was right to approve Dr. Herron then, it is right now. Those Grinnell people are actuated not so much by sympathy with me as they are by a desire to down Dr. Herron politically.

"For eight years Miss Rand was as intimate in our house as if she were the sister of myself or Dr. Herron. As to a prospective marriage between Dr. Herron and Miss Rand, that is their affair. If the marriage takes place the public can draw its own conclusions, and if it does not, why, the same is true. Neither Dr. Herron nor Miss Rand has a better friend in the world than myself."

And when the professor was questioned along these lines he said:

"They may crucify me at the cross, or burn me at the stake, yet I will make no answer to personal attacks upon me. I have made a vow and I will not break it."

Former Wife Still His Friend.

Prof. Herron is at present engaged in the preparation of a book, in which it is expected he will announce his "era-making word," and in which he will appeal to human kind to accept his beliefs about matrimony and religion, even though his example may not be followed. The former Mrs. Herron says that she is still the professor's friend. He declares that he has the greatest respect for her, but says he has ceased to love her.

The news of Prof. Herron coming into possession of $11,000,000 amazed his friends and startled church circles, but there seems to be no room for doubt that he really has the money, and, what is more, that Miss Rand is glad that he has it.

THE NEW CHINESE ARMY.

Reorganization Taking Place Under the Influence and Training of the Japanese.

It has been decided by the Lien Ping Chu, or Chinese war department, at Peking, that for the future the new army of China is to be known as the standing army of the empire, says a New York Sun writer.

The old Changpei banner army becomes the First division under Gen. Tsao Kun, with headquarters at Paotingfu, 85 miles southwest of Peking in the province of Chili. The former First division becomes the Second, under Gen. Chang Hsaichih, headquarters at Chenan, and the late Second division is renumbered the Fourth, under Gen. Wu Fengling, headquarters at Machang. The Third division remains unchanged, and is commanded by Gen. Tuan Chihkuei. The former Fourth becomes the Fifth division under Gen. Tuan Julchel, and occupies the Imperial Hunting park south of Peking. The late Fifth, now Sixth, division is stationed in the province of Shantung, with headquarters at Tsinanfu, under Gen. Wu Changchun; and the former Sixth, now Seventh, division is stationed at Chentingfu, about 70 miles southwest of Paotingfu, both places on the line of the Peking-Hankow railway just opened for traffic.

It will be observed that the new organization of the Chinese army is in divisions after the model of the Japanese, and that those already formed are all in the north of China grouped about the capital, the division in Shantung covering the road leading direct to Peking from the German Kiaochau-Tsinanfu railroad. The young Chinese officers, who, having completed their military studies in Japan, lately returned to China, are, with the Japanese instructors, placed at the disposal of the Chinese government, busy organizing and training the new levies.

The troops of the provinces of Szechuen raised and organized at the time of the invasion of Thibet have already seen their first war service. Those sent in July last to Batange on the Kinsha river, which forms the boundary between Szechuen and Thibet at that point, for the purpose of avenging the death of the Chinese assistant resident, Feng Chuan, gained a decisive victory over the Thibetans at a place called Ehriangtan, and subsequently occupied Tingpa, a position on the road into eastern Thibet.

UNSEEN IN A SAW

There are unseen things about this Saw. You cannot see the fine texture of the Steel; takes a sharp, cutting edge and holds it longer than any other Saw. You cannot see the toughness of fibre; bends without a break or a kink. SILVER STEEL, the finest crucible steel in the world, is made on the Atkins formula, tempered and hardened by the Atkins secret process, and used only in Atkins Saws. You cannot see the perfectly graduated taper of the blade; runs easily, without buckling.

But you can see the Atkins trade-mark and it is your protection when you buy a Saw. We are saw-makers and our trade-mark on a Saw means that it is our own make and that we are justly proud of it. We make all types and sizes of Saws for all purposes.

Atkins Saws, Corn Knives, Perfection Floor Scrapers, etc., are sold by all good hardware dealers. Catalogue on request.

"I could eat nothing but the very lightest food and even that gave me great distress.

...YARD

BURIAL

...to face with [illegible] and when, as the ... in the east, their father ... to the camp, they eagerly welcomed him, ready to listen to what he might have to say and willing to follow his advice.

In answer to their inquiries as to where he had been he explained that after he had offered sacrifice on the altar, he had gone to the towering terebinth tree which overlooked the site of Shechem that he might more fully view the surrounding country and contemplate their future course.

"And while there the Lord met me, and said unto me: 'Arise, go up to Bethel, and dwell there; and make there an altar unto God, that appeared unto thee when thou fleddest from the face of Esau, thy brother.'"

"Let us go at once, then," exclaimed the brothers, to whom any move now seemed better than staying in that place.

"Nay, but we cannot go until we have prepared ourselves to meet our God," Jacob declared, solemnly. "The place to which we have been told to go is Beth-El—the house of God—it is the place where God met me nearly 30 years ago, when I fled from home; it is where God gave me His promises of blessing. And He hath kept me and blessed me and returned me to this land; but before we go up to Bethel we must needs purge ourselves. We must put away the strange gods that are among us, and put off from us the garments which were seized with the spoil of Shechem."

The sons moved uneasily and looked guiltily down upon their fine raiment. They remembered how zealously and with superstitious awe they had gathered the idols of the people of Shechem and had set them up in their tents. Their prolonged stay near Shechem and their presence at many of the heathen feasts had familiarized them with the worship of these idols, and they had thought to preserve them and worship them.

"Bring them all here to me," he concluded. "Both the images and the garments and the ornaments which are the symbols of thy idolatry."

The command of Jacob created no small stir among the people of his household and among the servants, but there were none who dared to disobey, and one after another they came bearing the idols big and little, the garments, and the earrings and ornaments. Even the women and children of the Shechemites caught the spirit of the movement and brought the images and ornaments which they had concealed about them. The heap grew until it stood level with Jacob's head, and the people all stood about observing him and wondering what he would do. Mounting the pile and stamping the idols under his heels, he cried:

"These [illegible] are no gods at all, for there is but one God, the God of Heaven, the God of Abraham, and of Isaac and of Jacob. See that ye utterly put these things away from you, and turn to the true God, for it is only as you seek and follow Him that He will be near you to deliver you."

Rachel standing with the rest heard the words. She remembered the images of her father which still rested within her tent. During all these years she had kept her secret from Jacob, not daring to let him know that she had been guilty of taking them. But must she—could she, give them up?

"Is there one who is withholding aught of that which is displeasing to God," she heard Jacob say.

She felt that the words were meant for her. She dare not look up, but she was certain his eyes were searching her out, and would learn her secret. With a nervous, frightened cry she fled to her tent and soon appeared with the images in her hands, and while the eyes of all were fastened upon her she brought them and threw them upon the pile. Then her confusion and shame overcame her and she fell in a helpless heap to the ground. Jacob was first at her side, and as he bent over her he whispered:

"My love, even the gods of Laban could not save us. Come, let us bury these abominations at the foot of the sacred tree of the Shechemites where God appeared unto me last night," and lifting her to her feet he led her towards the distant spot, first placing in her hands the images she had just brought, and he himself seizing others. And the sons and the women and the children and all the rest, inspired by their example, also filled their hands from the pile until not an image, or ornament or garment was left. Thus laden, the long procession led by Jacob and Rachel wended its way towards the terebinth tree, where with solemn ceremony and fresh pledges to the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob they cast them into the pit which eager hands soon dug; and the amazed Canaanites, beholding the strange proceedings from afar, became panic-stricken with superstitious fear, and fled to their various cities, spreading the report that the God of Jacob had seized and destroyed all the other gods of the land, and that any who molested Jacob or his people would fall under the devouring wrath of the great God. And so it came to pass as they journeyed that the terror of God fell upon the cities that were round about them, and they did not pursue after the sons of Jacob.

HERE was consternation in the household of Jacob. One of the sheep herders had come hurrying in that morning and reported to the sons that a strong body of Canaanites had been lurking about in the vicinity, and judging by their dark looks and the fact that they were fully armed there was reason to expect trouble. It was now a week since the massacre of the men of Shechem and the spoiling of the city, and the awful passions of hatred and revenge which had stirred Simeon and Levi and their brothers and made them like madmen had subsided, and with the reaction had come forebodings of trouble. The boldness of unreasoning rage and passion had been succeeded by the weakness and fear of an accusing consciousness of guilt and crime, and now the alarming news of that morning had created a panicky desire to flee. In this spirit they sought out their father and appealed to him to strike their tents and steal away as quickly and quietly as possible.

"We may be attacked this very night," Simeon exclaimed, apprehensively. "Let us flee at once. To-day."

"But whither?" Jacob asked. Though uneasy over the disquieting reports he maintained his self-control, and was disposed to move with caution.

"Whither?" queried Reuben, the eldest son, in surprise. "Where can we go but back towards the land of our mother's father? If we go forward or flee on either hand we but plunge ourselves more surely into the power of our enemies."

To this speech there was ready and emphatic assent by the rest of the sons, and they waited for their father to speak. It was plain to see that a conflict was going on within his heart. He sat with bowed head, but his lips moved as though in prayer. At last he looked up and, speaking slowly, but with emphasis, he said:

"We cannot go back, my sons." And then noting the dark looks of disapproval and disappointment on the faces before him, he added:

"In obedience to God's word we have come into Canaan. He has promised us the land. We may not depart, except at His word. He is able to deliver us from the present peril."

"But we cannot stay here while our enemies are gathering to destroy us," Simeon cried, impatiently. He had been largely responsible for the attack upon the city of Shechem, and he now realized that as the leader of the movement, he must do his best to find a way of escape.

"Ah, my sons," sobbed Jacob, overcome by the thought of his own failures, "mine is the sin that we have tarried so long in this place. Had we but continued on to Bethel instead of pitching our tents before this city, all that has befallen us here would have been avoided."

He was silent for a few moments, and then continued, more cheerfully:

"But if we have sinned in thus lingering along the pathway God would have us travel, let us not commit the greater sin of rushing headlong, whither He does not lead. Let us await God's word in the present extremity."

And as he finished speaking he arose and left them. It was evident his words had had some effect, for the brothers lingered in a dispirited manner, no one seeming bold enough to take the lead and counsel a move contrary to their father's will, though it was very apparent that they were entirely out of sympathy with his attitude.

That night the flocks and the herds were all driven in and the camp made as secure as possible. The flashing signals from the surrounding hills did not tend to quiet the fears of the people, for that they guided and directed the gathering of the Canaanites they felt sure. The presence of the women and children of the men slain, and the rich booty they had seized were constant reminders of the danger that threatened them now.

And the unexplained absence of Jacob did not tend to lessen their apprehension. They had searched for him all through the camp, but had found him not, and no one seemed to be able to tell why he was missing or where he was to be found. No one had seen him since the afternoon before, and then he was going in the direction of the place where he had erected the altar to his God. That he

Guthrie, Okla.—A report was made to the ethnological department at Washington recently of the discovery at Webber's Falls, on the Arkansas river, in Indian territory, of the largest prehistoric burial ground found thus far on the American continent. Webber's Falls is located on the river about 25 miles south and east of the old army post at Fort Gibson. The burial ground is more than two miles in length and contains the bodies of many thousand people, presumably the remains of Mound Builders, and for this reason the discovery is considered all the more important in that it may lead to something definite regarding that prehistoric people.

Up until 40 years ago the land on which these remains were found was covered by a heavy growth of timber, some of the trees exceeding five feet in diameter, and also a thick growth of cane. A great part of the timber has been cut and the land placed under cultivation. In digging wells and other excavations human remains have been unearthed many times during the past few years, but causing little comment, as they were supposed to be the remains of Indians. Where the land along the benches near the Arkansas river bottom has been cultivated the heavy rains have caused washouts in places, bringing human remains to view in localities widely apart.

A few weeks ago D. A. McCorkle, an educated Indian of the Creek tribe, made discoveries on his farm, and informed the editor of the Fort Gibson Post regarding them. This led to an investigation, which revealed the fact that this burial ground extends for more than two miles along the river, parallel with the river, the graves being in regular order, about four feet apart, corresponding with points of the compass.

The dead people were buried facing the east, all in the same posture or position. With each was found an earthen bowl, in every instance being held in the bend of the right arm. In most cases the bones and bowls crumble when exposed to the air for a short time, but some were in a fair state of preservation.

In no instance, save one, was any implement of war found, and that was a spearhead about nine inches long, in the grave of a man apparently seven feet tall, while the other figures were below the average height of the American people of to-day.

A remarkable feature was the thickness of the skulls, some exceeding a half inch in thickness, with receding foreheads and heavy back heads.

According to Prof. Edwards, a prominent archaeologist, who visited the territory to investigate a discovery at Redland, other graves in this locality were those of people who died 20,000 years ago. The discovery at Redland was that of an immense battlefield, where Prof. Edwards claimed occurred the greatest battle ever fought on American soil. He expressed his belief that the battle took place 20,000 years ago, thousands of men being killed. Redland is about 25 miles lower down the river from the burial ground recently discovered at Webber's Falls.

Prof. Edwards made a statement at that time that the geological history of the American continent possibly dated back about 200,000,000 years, in which there were 17 periods, during each of which the face of the continent was changed

"It was in one of the western towns of our state a few weeks ago," said the Chicago drummer, "and I observed that a crowd of admirers was following a young man from place to place and making a hero of him, and I naturally inquired of a citizen:

"'Who and what is that young man?'

Traveling agents and salesmen are now sent from the home offices of the Chicago packers into all South American and Asiatic countries. They are going into every land, no matter what language may be spoken or what money be used. They will exchange their goods for cowries or elephant tusks—anything to sell the product and get something in return convertible into money. It may seem odd to some folks, but traveling men, carrying cases with samples of American meat products, can be seen in the desert of Sahara, the sands of Zanzibar or in Brazil, "where the nuts come from." Great is the enterprise of the Yankee merchant. The greater the market, the greater the price and stability of the price of the product and all that goes to make it in its various stages.

...the White Burley ... Association, form... sign of controlling the ... crop of the United ... tion to the Tobacco ... elected officers as follows: Cincinnati, President; ... Adams, Cynthiana, Vice ... W. J. Friedland, Cincinnati, Treasurer; B. D. Berry, Secretary. It had been expected that W. ... kins, who has been the leading ... the organization, would ... elected president, but he ... any controversy in the ... ominating Mr. Stuart for ... dent, thinking this was for the ... interest of the Association and ... growers.

The association has been incorporated for $1,500,000, $250,000 of the stock having been taken by the growers of the burley tobacco belt embraced in the Bluegrass counties of Kentucky, several counties in Ohio, and one in West Virginia. The assignment of stock to which the growers were required to subscribe, was as follows: Anderson county, $5,000; Bath, $7,500; Boyle, $1,250; Boone, $5,000; Bourbon, $12,500; Bracken, $7,500; Carroll, $7,500; Clark, $10,000; Campbell, $5,500; Carter, $3,500; Fayette, $10,000; Fleming, $7,500; Franklin, $7,500; Gallatin, $5,000; Garrard, $5,000; Grant, $7,500; Harrison, $12,500; Henry, $7,500; Jessamine, $5,000; Kenton, $3,750; Lewis, $5,000; Madison, $2,500; Marion, $15,000; Mercer, $2,500; Montgomery, $7,500; Nicholas, $7,500; Owen, $10,000; Pendleton, $7,500; Robertson, $2,500; Scott, $15,000; Shelby, $15,000; Spencer, $5,000; Trimble, $5,000; Washington, $7,500; Woodford, $12,500; Adams, O., $7,500; Brown, O., $10,000; Clermont, O., $5,000; Lawrence, W. Va., $2,500; Switzerland, O., $3,750; Hamilton, O., $2,500.

These county subscriptions aggregate $250,000, of which 10 per cent. has been paid in cash. The additional funds necessary, it is alleged by the leaders of the movement, will be furnished by Chicago capitalists.

"The Burley Growers' Association was not organized for the purpose of fighting the tobacco combine," says Mr. Stuart. "The combine will be our best customer. The association was formed to secure better prices for the tobacco growers of Kentucky and Ohio. In previous years average prices obtained were from 6½ to 7 cents per pound, but for the present crop we expect to realize for the farmers about 9 or 10 cents."

The following business was disposed of by the Fiscal Court at its term, last week, Esq. M. C. Norman presiding in place of County Judge Cason, who was ill. Justices present—Solon Early, Moses Scott, J. H. Walton and Clinton Gaines:

Each of the Justices and the clerk allowed $3 for holding this term of the court.

A corn husking after the fashion of half a century ago would be a novelty in this county. They were a very common occurrence in slave time, and nothing was more entertaining than to hear 25 or 30 colored voices about midnight singing the "corn songs," as they were assembled around the shocks, taking the large ears of corn from the coats nature had provided for them. A person who never attended an old fashioned husking bee has no idea with which such occasions were looked forward to in a neighborhood. The traditional jug was a considerable factor in these open air entertainments at night. Even lunar seemed to look down upon these gatherings with approval.

BASE BALL.

About 700 people saw the game of ball between the Reds and Boones played here last Wednesday afternoon. For four innings it was a very nice game, but in the fifth inning the Boones took the balloon route, and before the trouble could be stopped the Reds scored seven runs, giving them nine up to that time. It was the first time Conner was ever known to go up in the air. Brady pitched the remaining four innings in which the visitors made two hits and three runs. The home team was not up to its usual form or the visitors would have found them not quite so easy to handle. Following is the score by innings:

Cincinnati	0	0	2	0	7	0	0	1	2	—12

NOTES.

The Reds made three home runs and struck out seven men.

The day was just such a one as Dr. Crisler had been praying for.

People came from everywhere "and from across the river," to see the game.

The Boones ought to profit by the example of last Wednesday and put more ginger in their game.

The base ball public responded liberally to Dr. Crisler's necessity, last Wednesday, by coming out to see the game.

The Indians drew considerably the largest crowd, but a great many who did not see the Indians were on hand last Wednesday.

Bridwell, the first man to face Conner, struck out. He struck out three men in the five innings that he officiated at the slab.

In their practice before the game the Boones handled the ball like professionals, but they fell down badly when they went into real action.

The Reds were decidedly the fastest ball tossers that were ever on the diamond here, and when amateurs go up against professionals the great difference is soon manifested.

Bancroft, manager of the Reds, said Burlington is the smallest town to which he ever took the Reds for an exhibition game, and that it takes a man who is dead game to put up a guarantee as Manager Crisler did.

When Mount Slayback out-footed one of the Reds in a race between first and second bases, in the Red's effort to get back to first, the aforesaid Red was very much surprised to think a farmer could run the faster.

Dayton, Ohio, which belongs to the Central League, has made Ray Conner, one of the pitchers for the Boones, an offer of $100 a month for next season. Ray has many friends who hope to see him get a position in fast company.

Check made a long run and a left hand catch of a fly from Brady's bat, which looked good for at least two bags, and was given hearty plause. The fifth was the fatal inning. In this Conner gave three men first base, which supplemented by Walton's error at third, and Hinchman's home run drive to left field and a few other heart-breaking incidents, netted the Reds seven runs.

Brady went into pitch at the beginning of the sixth inning and Bridwell and Seigel the first two men up struck out, and Hinchman was thrown out by Conner at short. In the seventh inning the Reds went out in one, two, three order, but in the eighth Check made a home run drive to right field. In the ninth inning Brady gave two men first base on balls, in which inning they made two runs.

Brady did about all the sensational playing in the game. His first was a left-hand stop of a hot ground to second, which he handled nicely, cutting the man down at first. When after two men were out in the ninth inning, and the Boones had only a long string of noughts, he made a daring steal of the home plate, being the only Boone who reached home. The steal was deliberately planned and daringly executed. The play received applause from the 700 witnesses.

Quite a crowd of Walton base ball fans came down last Saturday to root for their boys, and to say they were enthusiastic along that line in the first game only partially describes the scenes from the start to the finish of the first game, but when Mr. Turner was taken out of the box and Fullilove substituted in the game with Hebron, Phelps Walton, Hebron's little wonder, turned enthusiasm into surprise and finally into grief, and gave Walton a dose of the same medicine it had administered to the Boones in the first game, letting the visitors return with a string of Boone scalps while they were scalpless themselves. The first game was between Walton and the Boones, and was a complete route in favor of Walton, the Boones being utterly unable to connect with the delivery of Turner, who was pitching to perfection for Walton, while the batting of these two hired men was terrific and demoralizing to the Boones. In seven of the nine innings the first three Boones at the bat made outs, and they succeeded in getting but one man to third base during the game. All their troubles were at the bat, as shown by the three measly little hits with which they are credited. Below is the score by innings:

Batteries—Brady and Hawes; Turner and Ryan.

Base Hits—Conner, Slayback 2, Chambers, Nicholson 2, Allen.

Two base hits—Turner 2, [illegible].

Three base hit—Turner.

Struck out—By Brady [illegible] 12.

Errors—Boones 2; Walton, 2.

Umpire—Shearer.

Following is the score by innings in the Hebron-Walton game:

Hebron	1	0	2	0	0	—8

Base hits—Ernst, Gordon, Turner, Nicholson, Ryan.

Three base hit—Ernst.

Struck out—By Walton 5, by Fullilove 4.

Errors—Hebron 3; Walton 1.

Batteries—Walton and Turner; Fullilove and Ryan.

The feature of this game was the pitching of Walton in the fourth inning, when, with only one Walton man out and three on bases, he struck out the last two men up, and prevented a score.

NOTES.

Walton made two and the Boones one double play.

In very few instances did the Boones knock a [illegible] diamond.

Walton has driven the Boones to the woods three times in their four clashes.

The Grays, of Burlington, will play Walton on the latter's grounds, next Saturday afternoon.

It does not do for a runner to go to sleep when Brady is in the box. He caught two snoozing last Saturday.

Had Walton put Turner in the box against Hebron instead of against the Boones both games might have been closer.

As Mrs. B. B. Hume, Mrs. Everett Stephens and Misses Pauline Curley and Clara Diers, of Walton, were returning home from Burlington, last Saturday afternoon in a trap that was drawn by two horses driven by Mrs. Hume, they attempted to pass the buggy in which were Mrs. J. M. Lassing and Miss Martha Lassing, when near Richwood, and the trap was upset and the ladies thrown violently to the ground. The young ladies escaped injury, Mrs. Stephens' face was cut and bruised considerably, while three of Mrs. Hume's ribs were broken. Her injuries were so severe that she could not be removed from the scene of the accident until after medical aid had been received, and she was yet unconscious when she reached home. Mrs. Stephens was thrown about 30 feet over against the fence, and was unconscious for some time. The horses ran with the trap which was demolished before they were stopped by Berry Noell, who was on the road ahead of the party. Mrs. Hume's injuries are giving her considerable trouble.

For the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June last the United States spent $117,000,000 on the navy. Every dollar we have spent intensifies the necessity of spending a great deal more. The cost of maintaining what we have already built will be enormous, and men must be educated for officers of the ships now in service and those in process of construction. A great navy is a costly thing, but perhaps it is cheaper than war.

Secretary Wilson, of the department of agriculture, says that probably hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of buttermilk is thrown away in this country every year. He has learned recently from medical experts that buttermilk is very valuable in the treatment of diseases of the kidneys, such as Bright's disease and diabetes, and he says if some one would invent a plan by which it could be condensed and preserved for medicinal purposes the inventor would render humanity an invaluable service.

There the station master, Fred Gerner, receives messages by wire from New York and transmits them by wireless to Maj. Wetmore.

Japan won by forcing the fight. It struck the first blow, and followed it up so quickly and so savagely that Russia was defeated on land and sea before it knew it. It was a short war, all things considered, beginning in February a year ago, and yet in casualties it left over six hundred thousand victims on the field of battle, and cost both contestants together more than one billion dollars. Beyond question, this frightful loss of life and property hastened the conclusion of peace; for behind President Roosevelt stood the powerful influence of all the great bankers of the world.

Insurance Investigations.

That the astounding total of more than $2,600,000 has been paid as commissions by the Mutual Life Insurance Co. to two members of the family of Richard A. McCurdy, president of the company, and the promise of District Attorney Jerome that the insurance scandals certainly will be submitted later to an extraordinary grand jury were among the sensational developments in the insurance situation. W. F. Thummel, an attorney of the Mutual Life Insurance Co. testified that he paid to the chairman of the republican congressional campaign committee the sum of $2,500 in cash as a campaign contribution.

In the testimony before the special legislative committee investigating the methods of insurance companies the sensational development was when Mr. Hughes demanded the payroll of the executive officers of the Mutual Life Insurance Co. This was produced and showed the salaries of these officers since 1877. For the year 1904 President McCurdy received $150,000; two vice presidents were paid $50,000 each, a second vice president $17,500, the general manager $25,000, who this year will receive $30,000, and the treasurer $50,000.

President McCall, of the New York Life Insurance Co., testified before the legislative committee that there was no record on the books of the New York Life Insurance Co. of the $150,000 paid the national republican committee for contribution for presidential campaigns. While he had no personal knowledge that the money was paid, he assumed it was, because he had told the treasurer to make the payments.

YOU HAVE NO RIGHT

To Suffer from Constipation, Bowel and Stomach Trouble.

Q. What is the beginning of sickness?
A. Constipation.
Q. What is Constipation?
A. Failure of the bowels to carry off the waste matter which lies in the alimentary canal where it decays and poisons the entire system. Eventually the results are death under the name of some other disease. Note the deaths from typhoid fever and appendicitis, stomach and bowel trouble at the present time.
Q. What causes Constipation?
A. Neglect to respond to the call of Nature promptly. Lack of exercise. Excessive brain work. Mental emotion and improper diet.
Q. What are the results of neglected Constipation?
A. Constipation causes more suffering than any other disease. It causes rheumatism, colds, fevers, stomach, bowel, kidney, lung and heart troubles, etc. It is the one disease that starts all others. Indigestion, dyspepsia, diarrhea, loss of sleep and strength are its symptoms—piles, appendicitis, and fistula, are caused by Constipation. Its consequences are known to all physicians, but few sufferers realize their condition until it is too late. Women become confirmed invalids as a result of Constipation.
Q. Do physicians recognize this?
A. Yes. The first question your doctor ask you is "are you constipated?" That is the secret.
Q. Can it be cured?
A. Yes, with proper treatment. The common error is to resort to physics, such as pills, salts, mineral water, castor oil, injections, etc., every one of which is injurious. They weaken and increase the malady. You know this by your own experience.
Q. What then should be done to cure it?
A. Get a bottle of Mull's Grape Tonic at once. Mull's Grape Tonic will positively cure Constipation and Stomach trouble in the shortest space of time. No other remedy has been known to cure Constipation positively and permanently.
Q. What is Mull's Grape Tonic?
A. It is a Compound containing 40 per cent of the juice of Concord grapes. It exerts a strengthening, healing influence upon the intestines, so that they can do their work unaided. The process is gradual but sure. It is not a physic. It is unlike anything else you have ever used, but it cures Constipation, dysentery, stomach and bowel trouble. Having a rich, fruity grape flavor, it is pleasant to take. As a tonic it is unequaled, insuring the system against diseases. It strengthens and builds up waste tissue.
Q. Where can Mull's Grape Tonic be had?
A. Your druggist sells it. The dollar bottle contains nearly three times the 50-cent size.

Good for ailing children and nursing mothers. A Free Bottle to all who have never used it, because we know it will cure you.

Are in the Lead.

Louisville, Ky., Oct. 7.—The canvass of the registration returns have been completed and shows a total vote of 47,814. Of this number 26,873 are democrats, 11,323 republicans and 9,418 independents.

Danger of the Republic.

Boodle and the Corporations Control the Corrupt Party in Power.

When the democrats claimed, in 1896 and in succeeding campaigns, that an enormous corruption fund was raised from [illegible] trusts, trust companies, [illegible] corporations and other sources, it was indignantly denied by the republicans. Since those campaigns the evidence has been leaking out that those charges were true and the amount not exaggerated. Enough money was subscribed to buy every voter that was willing to sell his vote in the doubtful states, and the result in 1896 showed that of the votes so bought about 20,000 divided between the close states decided the election.

The latest evidence on the providers of that corruption fund has been given by Mr. Perkins, partner of J. P. Morgan and also connected with the New York Life Insurance company, before the committee of the New York legislature, now investigating the life insurance companies of that state. He testified that the New York Life Insurance company paid $50,000 last fall to the republican campaign fund, and that greater sums were paid in 1896 and 1900.

These enormous contributions from one corporation indicate the vast amount of money used to corrupt the voters of the United States, for there is no doubt the other insurance companies paid similar amounts, and the railroads and trusts even more.

Eighteen hundred and ninety-six was the beginning of the era of graft and corruption that has since spread like a prairie fire from one end of the country to the other and that has resulted in the scandals that have been exposed of the republican management of our national affairs and those states where that party is in the ascendancy. Will the honest voters allow such a system to continue? If they do, it is not too much to say that the republic will be undermined and a Wall street oligarchy of wealth will soon rule instead of the people.

We are not very far from that to-day. We hear of visits of Wall street magnates to Oyster Bay and we see their partners appointed to positions where they can do vast service to their associates, which from the nature of things must be to the detriment of the people. President Roosevelt must have known of the large contributions from the Wall street interests to his campaign fund. Mr. Bliss, the treasurer of the republican national committee, received the money and Mr. Cortelyou, who has since been rewarded by his appointment as postmaster general and is still chairman of the republican national committee, expended what the trusts and the corporations provided.

The late Senator Hanna might be excused for demanding and expending such vast sums as he received in 1896, for the republican emergency was great, but last year there was no need to corrupt the voters.—It was patent to even superficial observers that Mr. Roosevelt would be elected at least three months before the event occurred. The fact is that the republican workers have become so debauched by being paid that they refuse to work or vote until the usual honorarium and boodle is forthcoming.

Is anyone foolish enough to believe that these corporations contribute these large sums without expecting, and probably being promised, advantages or special privileges in return. The trust corporations pay to prevent tariff reform; the railroads pay to prevent being controlled; the banks and life insurance companies pay because they are controlled by the same financial interests, and receive special favor and privileges from the political managers.

How do democrats, who are paying double for life insurance than what it is honestly worth and who own stock in railroads and banks, like their money being expended to keep the corporations in power, instead of the larger dividends that would be paid under an honest administration?

The beef trust is still selling adulterated meat. At the instance of the League Island navy yard officials, the agent of Swift & Co., the Chicago packers, has been arrested in Philadelphia for food adulteration and bound over by the magistrate in $1,000 bail. The prosecution is under the Pennsylvania state law, there being no federal statute under which persons selling impure food can be prosecuted.

It does not speak well for the pure food commissioners of other states that no similar efforts are being made to discover the sale of embalmed beef where such laws for the protection of the people are on the statute books. It is hardly likely that artificial preservatives are only used by the beef packers on meat destined for Pennsylvania. Nor is this an isolated case.

"According to a statement made to him by attorneys for Swift & Co., Commissioner Warren says the concern admits, through its lawyers, that it has been selling meat in which artificial preservatives which are prescribed by law have been placed. During the last year, Mr. Warren states, Swift & Co. have paid more than $2,000 in fines for violation of the pure food laws of the state."

Tariff Revision Demanded

Massachusetts Republicans Fighting the Machine and the Protected Trusts.

The fight within the republican party of Massachusetts for tariff reform is being vigorously waged. The committee of 100, composed of many prominent republicans, has issued a call to republican voters to join with them to secure the adoption of a plank in the platform, to be adopted by the state convention favoring a revision of the tariff.

Republican voters are asked to forward a petition to the convention to insert the following in the platform:

"We demand that hides, coal, iron, ore, lumber and wood pulp be placed by congress on the free list, and that duties upon manufactured and other articles be reduced wherever existing duties are higher than are needed for any just purpose of protection."

The stand-patters, led by Senator Lodge, control the republican machine and have declared against the above programme and intend to nominate candidates who are hostile to that policy. As the protected trusts and corporations furnish the campaign funds for the Lodge machine, the reform element of the republican party will probably be defeated in the caucuses and convention.

The only hope for tariff reform is for those republicans that feel that it is for the best interest of the whole country to join with the democrats, instead of fighting a hopeless battle for reform within their own party.

The trusts and corporations of all descriptions are united to keep the republican machine in power in every state and to control congress; they are willing to spend large amounts of money to do this. To overcome such corruption those who favor tariff reform, railroad rate legislation and the general purification of politics, must act together. They must rally to the democratic standard when congress is elected next year—that is the logic of the situation.

The Republican Machine.

Corporation Oil Seems Ineffective in Lubricating the Crooked Parts.

The "Corroupt Old Party" is having trouble with its machine, it is continually slipping a cog, which all the oil furnished by the trusts and corporations—not forgetting the life insurance companies—is unable to make run smoothly. The latest loose cog is in New Jersey, where the republican machine has closer and more confidential relations with the combines than, perhaps, anywhere else. Everett Colby has cleaned out the Lentz machine there, on a platform of taxing the corporations and other reforms, and the voters approved it. As the Boston Transcript says: "Those who have read Lincoln Steffens' story of politics in New Jersey, and have given confidence to his statements, must have been convinced that the state offered a rich and inviting field for the reformer, or at least the awakener."

Wherever an honest reformer, be he republican or democrat, takes up the cause of the people against the railroads he gathers followers to his banner, even in the darkest spots, and this latest victory should be an incentive for others to follow the example.

So far, however, these spasmodic reforms within the republican ranks have proven successful in but one state—Wisconsin—and there only through the leadership of Gov. La Follette after years of ardent endeavor. In other states the voters have wisely joined forces with the democrats and by the defeat of the republican ring leaders, taught their party a lesson that is impossible for it to forget.

There is every incentive for honest republicans to join with democrats to stop grafting and corruption, to reform the tariff, to control unreasonable railroad rates, to enforce equal taxation of corporations and individuals, to reduce taxation and elect honest and capable representatives and other public servants.

Mothers Are Helped

THEIR HEALTH RESTORED

Happiness of Thousands of Homes Due to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Mrs. Pinkham's Advice.

A devoted mother seems to listen to every call of duty excepting the supreme one that tells her to guard her health, and before she realizes it some derangement of the female organs has manifested itself, and nervousness and irritability take the place of happiness and amiability.

Tired, nervous and irritable, the mother is unfit to care for her children, and her condition ruins the child's disposition and reacts upon herself.

The mother should not be blamed, as she no doubt is suffering with backache, headache, bearing-down pains or displacement, making life a burden.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the unfailing cure for this condition. It strengthens the female organs and permanently cures all displacements and irregularities.

Such testimony as the following should convince women of its value:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:

"I want to tell you how much good Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done me. I suffered for eight years with ovarian troubles. I was nervous, tired and irritable, and it did not seem as though I could stand it any longer, as I had five children to care for. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound was recommended and it has entirely cured me. I cannot thank you enough for your letter of advice and for what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me.—Mrs. Ph. Hoffman, 100 Himrod Street, Brooklyn, N. Y."

FREE TURNPIKES.

They Are Worth all They Cost And Pay Large Dividends Indirectly.

To the Editor of the Recorder:

I have been requested by friends of free turnpikes to answer a communication in your issue of Sept. 20th, signed "Lowtax," who ask the friends of free turnpikes to go back through the cycle of ages to the beginning of time to the garden of Eden where Eve made the first mistake, and fell under the displeasure of God, and both Adam and Eve were put out of the garden to earn their living by the sweat of their brow, that he may demonstrate to them the fearful punishment that will be visited upon them if they are so dishonest and hypocritical as to persist in voting for free turnpikes.

It was fortunate for Adam and Eve that "Lowtax" was not born in the beginning and placed in the garden of Eden, for God could never have ejected him because of his nonprogressive spirit, and he would have forever blocked the way of human progress, just as he is attempting to do today.

The subject of Good Roads has been agitating the minds of the people of Boone county for years, as it has the people of the several states and nation, and I might say, the nations, for Napolean in his day and age built public roads that are today pointed to as monuments of his statesmanship.

The progressive and enterprising men of Kentucky have held a number of conventions to consider the question of good roads and push the work along. Ohio has inagurated a series of meetings throughout the state for this fall to consider the subject of good roads and push the improvement of public highways, although their roads are very much better than ours. Why should we not improve our roads and our county and keep up with the procession? Bad roads are relics of barbarism, and represent a nonprogressive spirit and a lack of enterprise, progress and improvement. On account of bad roads we cannot have free mail delivery on the farm, although we pay our part of the tax to support it.

Regardless of the charge of dishonesty and hypocrasy made by "Lowtax," the progressive men of Boone county are taking the proper legal steps to acquire the right to buy and build turnpikes and make them free, and are doing this in the open light of day without idshonesty or sinister motive whatever, and such insinuations are not applicable to men who favor free turnpikes or men who advocate any other public improvement. Neither are they becoming in, or add to the reputation of "Lowtax," who evidently believes he holds the edge on frankness of statement and honesty of purpose.

"Lowtax" objects to free turnpikes, first, because public improvements costs more than the same work built by individuals or corporations. That is true in practice, but not necessarily true in fact, except where there is graft in it. "Lowtax" does not want to pay toll nor tax and should be frank and say so and not hide behind the argument that, he does not want to burden posterity. Second, it would place an indebtedness upon the county and increase taxes. That is true. It takes money to buy and build good roads, and the county would have to go in debt, but it is sometimes economy to go in debt, and this is one of the instances. We are now paying 10c tax on the $100 worth of property for building and improving the roads which is insufficient to make any durable improvements, and is therefore practically lost. Now, increase the tax to 25c on the $100 worth of property and under proper management and honest application of tax so collected, every road of any importance in the county can be made good in ten years.

Third, "Lowtax" says, "if roads are free to travel that they will not be kept up." I have had some experience in traveling in six counties in the state before and since the pikes were made free, and I find that the roads are in about the same condition now that they were before the change. Roads that were paying a dividend were kept in good condition, roads not paying dividends were neglected and went down, and they are in like condition at present. Important roads are kept in good condition, others do not fare so well. Just so you will find the turnpikes in Boone today, and every pike in the county without the condition is commensurate of by the people. Those who want the roads get all the toll [illegible] put as little on the roads as possible. Then why not make them free and let the people all have a say as to the condition they should be kept in?

I am inclined to believe "Lowtax" has never read the law providing for free turnpikes, or if he did, he failed to comprehend it. For it not only provides for buying roads already [illegible] building new ones, and contemplates making good roads all over the county, if the people desire them and will do their part in building them, and possibly, they might extend to the domicile of "Lowtax," and from his closing remarks, I judge he would then become as dishonest and hypocritical as men who vote for free turnpikes are in his estimation now, for then he would enjoy some of the benefits of good roads, and his mind would expand, and mental visions would be restored, and his interpretation of the acts of men who honestly differ with him would under-go a change and the hay merchant, doctor, huckster, Standard Oil and the men whose taxes are small and riding large, would become honest and and sincere and their morality would be improved and they would no longer be found on the race course and dancing pavilion. Their elongated countenances wuuld be contracted to their normal condition and reinforced by "Lowtax" would send out benevolent and honest rays of gladness, that would truly "envelope, permeate and supply the Holy Bible with sanctity."

The adoption and enforcement of the new law and consequent increase of tax would make my tax exceed the toll I pay now, but the advantages of good roads would more than compensate for the difference. Why do men who own farms and lands, build houses, barns, fences, concrete walks and gravel roads to the highways, beautify and adorn their homes? It is very expensive. Because it is necessary for their comfort and convenience. It enhances the value of their property; it satisfies their pride, recommends them and adds to their reputation for intelligence, enlightenment and culture Just so with the county and people as a body. Good roads are necessary for the convenience of the people. They make the country, excite emulation, stimulate honest pride, increase a desire for knowledge, refinement and culture. They enhance the value of property and make it more desirable. They bring you nearer to the market and enable you to market hundreds of dollars worth of produce that is now wasted; they bring the people in close touch, increase acquaintances and sociability, and exert a good moral influence. There is no argument against them, they are worth all they cost, and pay large dividends indirectly.

Boone county is surrounded by States and counties that have good roads, free to the traveling public, that are prosperous and increasing in population, while Boone county is decreasing in population because of a lack of public spirit and public improvement.

IMPROVEMENT

Not The Question.—Free Pikes Do Not Mean Good Pikes.

I suppose there is not a person who does not enjoy improvements or who would not enjoy good pikes, not free pikes, because they are only free to those outside of the county; therefore improvement is not the question. The question is "are you able to impose a heavy tax on yourself for the benefit of someone else, or is it right to enact a law to help to take a part of the small earnings from him who is struggling to keep alive?" (not to live), for to live is to have the necessaries of life—to be alive is merely to have breath. It must be a stony heart that sets forth such British ideas as to want others to furnish the means that he may have the pleasure of this world, while he who is forced to give his mite must grin and bear it, regardless of his necessities. It is not a civilized nation in which one class enacts laws to rob another of what justly belongs to them, nor is he an American who is ever ready to help to tear down the principles of freedom and establish classified laws and privileges for a few.

Mr. Progress thinks it an imposition to have to stop every 4 or 5 miles to pay for what he has used. Of course it would not be such when he has someone else to pay it for him.

He says: "In the grand States of Indiana and Ohio they have no such impositions as toll gates." But he did not tell you that you can buy well improved farms along the so-called free pikes for less than you can buy them on the dirt roads in this county, and that some of the good citizens of both States, who have had experience with so-called free turnpikes advise Boone county people never to vote for them. He does not tell you that a tax of $2.50 to [illegible] is paid on the $200, that public expenses are causes of cheap homes, and yet dear to the owners. He did not tell you that they have boss assessors to appraise the property regardless of the owners opinion as to its value, and that the assessment stands for ten years regardless of the decrease in values. He did not tell you of any imposition that is forced on the people of the State by the bosses and would-be bosses of our Old Kentucky Homes if the people of the 15th century would listen to Progress and others who are for the country and not for their fellowmen.

15TH CENTURY.

FREE TURNPIKES

And Others Lambasted by Second Epistol of Lowtax.

VERONA, KY., Oct. 7th, 1905.

Several weeks ago the RECORDER published an article from the pen of Mr. Frank Russell. I do not know Mr. Russell, unless he is the man who was a politician, a few years ago, and traversed the county making speeches, advocating low tax, &c. If he is not now favoring high tax, his article does him an injustice. He seems to think that the posterity of the original subscribers to the turnpikes should ever after have free toll. The fact is the original subscribers built the pikes directly, and by so doing their land was enhanced in value much more than their subscriptions, and the men who bought their land paid the whole bill.

There are men through out the county, who have long been advocates of low tariff and low tax, and I have been told that they are now the grand architects of the high tax structure: Moral—It is not what a man says, but what he does that proves the man. Every preacher has his moral man sermon, on which he wastes his time in preparation and his words in delivery, wherein he expatiates on the comparison which some observer has made between the moral man on the out side and that other fellow on the in. But, Mr. Parson, it is not the moral man who is a drawback to the church; it is that member of the flock who produces his elastic vizage and is apparently a monument of consecration when in the church, and then goes out into the world and under the cloak of commerce swindles his neighbor, and under the reputation of the church borrows that which he pays not back; or under the protection of the law, votes an injustice upon his fellow-man. "Know then thyself, presume not God to scan, the proper study of mankind is man."

Free turnpikes are the forerunner of oppression. Free railroads, free transportation, free groceries, &c., follow in due time.

I have been told that there are free turnpike men in the north end, because there is a man of much property there, who has so managed his business that he forced the turnpike company to give him free toll. If there is such a man there he surely should not be envied, because every good citizen should contribute the amount of his toll toward keeping up the roads he travels. But what if this is true, are not these same free turnpike men trying to do that for which they condemn him?. He has others to pay toll to keep up the pikes for him, and they want others to pay tax to keep up the roads for them. Is there any sentence or word in the moral law that says two wrongs make a right?

I am told, furthermore, that there is a man there who so works his pike that the travel thereon is first thrown into a state of vexation, then irritation and then damnation. That in the spring he spreads rough rock on the road, many of which makes fine specimens of the mammoth Kentucky limestone, and that these rock drive the travel to the dirt part of the road, where he has erected numerous over-shot culverts or bumpers, and when you strike a bumper you take a horizontal, a perpendicular and a rotary motion at the same time. And [illegible] that he glories in [illegible] opportunity to so harrow [illegible] traveler. This, surely, is not true, [illegible] certainly can not be [illegible] patrons such discontent. The way to handle this man is by legislation. Compel him to work his road as it should be. "As the potter has power over the clay," so has the legislature power over its creature.

I wish to appeal to that class of men, who "Progress," from Idlewild, says, "favor free turnpikes because their hair has been rubbed the wroug way." They are probably men of principle, and I appeal to their manhood. Is it right to cast hardships upon three-fourths of the people in order to spite one or two others? I leave the answer to their common sense. But to "Progress" and his ilk I make no appeal, for they believe that "man born of woman is of few days and full of" hell; else that poor, disconsolate victim of a "relic of barbarism," would be allowed to roam unmolested over the public thoroughfares by day, and by night lay down to pleasant dreams of toll unpaid.

Light frost occurred in exposed places in the north central parts of the State. The week was favorable for farming operations, except that the ground was too dry for plowing. A good deal of land, however, has been prepared for winter wheat, and considerable of the crop has been sown. Rain is much needed, especially in the western portion of the State, where a scarcity of water is beginning to cause suffering to stock. Pastures are drying up and moisture is much needed for clover and other grasses. Rye is being sown. The apple crop is inferior and good apples will be scarce in this State Late pears vary according to localities. Irish and sweet potatoes are both good crops. Sorghum is a fair crop. A fourth crop of alfalfa is being cut in Campbell county".

Mrs. Richard Louden, of Scrapville, and Mrs. Minnie Kelly, of Lonesome Hollow, were guests of Elave Louden and wife, near Rabbit Hash, last Wednesday.

It is rumored here that our old friend, Bob Popham, has taken unto himself a rib in the person of Miss Katie Wingate. If true, we wish them happiness and prosperity.

Last Sunday evening we saw Omer McGuire drive into Bellevue with his new buggy, and sitting by his side was a Scrapville young lady. The gait he was driving would not cause swimming of the head, but is liable to cause a greener trouble than that of the heart.

We were asked a few days since "If its the duty of a Rural mail carrier to deliver a special delivery letter to the person to whom addressed." It is our opinion that it is, and based on the fact that the receiver of such a letter has to sign a receipt of date and hour received; consequently the carrier would have to deliver the same as a registered letter.

Mrs. J. W. Taliaferro, Misses Statira Childress and Katie Allingham, of Erlange, attended church here Saturday evening.

Mrs. Martha Weaver, of Tennessee, was the guest of her sisters, Meedames Hedges and Bannister for several days last week.

Misses Elizabeth and Catharine Hicks have the most diminutive and attractive pony and cart that travel the pike. It's a dandy.

Supt. Snyder has visited the schools in this section, and seemed pleased with Miss Helen Dickey's work as teacher at Union.

Mrs. Sallie Anderson is having a first-class mound cellar built at her home near Union. Mr. Abdon is the builder and contractor.

Any man who wants to work has no trouble getting all the wants in and around Union. In fact the demand far exceeds the supply.

Geo. H. Stevenson is decorating his house with two coats of paint in harmony with the surroundings, and appropriate to the architecture of same.

A corps of tabulators is rapidly tabulating the amount of tobacco raised in Boone county, for the Growers' Association. L. H. Voshell has charge of the work.

The Masonic Hall and store room up with a new dressing of white body and old gold trimming. The interior of the hall is pure white with frosted glass, &c., is pleasing to the eye and adds much to its attractiveness.

Games of euchre were numerous and exciting last week, and one good woman, who loves to play the best kind, grew so enthusiastic as to exclaim, "I go alone, take it up!" Only imagine the good woman's chagrin and disgust when she found it was the "Right Bower" that had been ordered up. Yes sir!!

Miss May Norman, who visited friends in Walton, recently, brought two gourds home with her that were certainly the largest specimens ever brought to Union, and it's certain nothing of the kind ever grew here. They measured 4 feet and 6 inches in length. The gourds were grown by Mrs. Kennedy (nee Eva Stansifer), who has the buildings of her home decorated with them.

A great observation of the country from Union to Walton and Walton itself not long since, convinced us that Frogtown and its surroundings are going steadily forward under the wise and efficient management of John Cleek, John Tanner and other citizens. Well, there is the city of Richwood, too, that holds its grip on the Southern and deals out a good article of progressive, up-to-date business that people all over this section uphold and appreciate. Messrs. J. C. Hughes, Ren Jackson and Bedinger Bros., backed up by a solid bank, presided over by C. Byland, are largely responsible for Richwood's richness. The fine crops along the pike from Richwood to Walton, testify to the industry of David Hicks, Lee Gaines and others, hustlers, while Walton itself is certainly a credit to Boone county. The canning factory, just a little previous to and fornince the city limits is one of the leading industries, and does a "skinning" business (they skin tomatoes), of unlimited capacity. The homes of Messrs. Tomlin, Cleek, Gaines, Lassing and others on Lexington pike ave., are certainly elegant. The various places of business along the entire ave. are neat, commodious and prosperous. The Graded School that so many people believed at first would pauperize the town has proved a great blessing, and promises to ultimately be of untold advantage, financially, morally and every way. The Union colony at Walton has increased many fold in the last 5 years and is just as well pleased as Frank Betts and family, who moved there years ago. Walton is a nice town.

The passing of Mr. Anselm Bristow on the morning of the sixth, was the moving of an old land-mark from Union vicinity. Forty-five years ago he was united in marriage to Miss Martha Wilson. To them were given five children, four of whom are living. The wife and mother passed to her reward a year ago. At the age of 21 he had conferred upon him the honors of the Masonic Order, and lived a faithful member and believer of its teachings. He was a regular attendant until a few years ago when his hearing became so imperfect he could no longer enjoy the meetings. Shortly after reaching manhood he united with the Primitive Baptist church, the doctrines of which he was a strong believer and advocate. His spare time was usually spent in reading his Bible, which was a great comfort to him in his old age. In the last years of his life, when afflictions came heavy, a kind Providence hovered near, a tender, faithful daughter stood by, ever ready to administer to his wants, and, with the aid of her brothers, all that was possible for human hands to do was done. Calmly and silently he passed away at the ripe old age of 83. A large assemblage of relatives and friends followed his remains to the cemetery, where the Masons performed the sad rites.

Z. T. Baker is stopping for the winter at the Palace Hotel, Cincinnati. He says batchelor life in winter is not worth living. He came out last Saturday and drove off the last of his cattle.

I do not know the man in the north end of the county who works his pike so that it is a vexation to travel, but I do know a man in the lower end of the county who says he puts loose rock on his road in the spring to destroy rubber tires, and in the fall constructs water-breaks for a further vexation. Could this man only hear the curses that have been hurled at him and his road he'd not be guilty of the like again.

A German statistician notes that the increased longevity of Europe within the last 50 years is more conspicuous among women than men.

A lion and a lioness in the zoo at Frankfort, Germany, roared in terror and tremblingly crouched in a corner of their cage because a ferret had accidentally entered it.

A Virginia paper ventures the opinion that "lots of young girls who are devoting lots of time to music lessons will learn after marriage that cooking is a more valuable accomplishment than thumping a piano."

It is reported that the Highland Scotchman is ceasing to drink whisky. A visitor to Scotland says that the typical Highlander, as he saw him this season, takes an occasional "nip," as before, but that beer is gradually ousting usquebaugh from its supremacy.

Dr. Werner von Bolton, in a short note that appears in the Zeitschrift fur Elektrochaemie, upon the hardness of wrought tantalum, states that in the earlier tests a mass of metal raised to a red heat, and then worked under the steam hammer had shown a degree of hardness approaching that of the diamond.

Under a treaty negotiated in 1903, the United States agreed to relinquish its claim to the Isle of Pines, off the Cuban coast in the Caribbean sea, in consideration of a grant of coaling and naval stations in Cuba. More than two years have elapsed since the treaty was drafted, but it still remains unratified.

"Uncle Sam" is preparing to go into the lumber business. Secretary Wilson will see to it that his interests are protected. Congress will be asked to organize on a permanent basis the forest service which has taken charge of the numerous reservations that have heretofore been controlled by the secretary of the interior. Since the first of July the forest reservations have passed to the department of agriculture.

Old mining men and prospectors in this region did not need to be told by Dr. Ami, of the geological survey, that great diamond wealth lay hidden in that part of Canada between the Great Lakes and Hudson bay. In the Rainy river district and in the auriferous valley of the Seine many diamonds have been obtained from Indians and French-Canadians voyagers, who had picked them up in their wandering without any idea of their character and value.

A project is under consideration in Vienna for the construction of a railroad system connecting European cities with the Far East and rivaling the great Siberian railway. By this new route Vienna would be brought within eight days of Peking and Shanghai instead of 18 days by the present Siberian route. The chief promoter of the new scheme seems to be one Dr. Spatzer, of Vienna, who has associated with him some prominent capitalists and financiers.

Living across the Willamette from Corvallis, Ore., at a distance of a mile or so, is a boy who, in the past six months, has shown such abnormal growth that he has doubled in weight. In this period of only half a year he has made the transition from a boy of 12 to the stature and weight of manhood. The beginnings of a growth of beard complete the sudden and swift change in which this lad, though still a boy in years, is a man in everything else. The case is said to be without parallel in medical annals.

A halt is to be called in the marriage procession in Nebraska, if the Nebraska Homeopathic association has its way, and all applicants for marriage licenses, either man or woman, must undergo a thorough physical examination before they will be permitted to wed. A bill to this effect will be introduced into the next state legislature, and the homeopaths of the state will use every effort to have it passed. The homeopaths believe that the spread of disease is due, more than to any other cause, to diseased persons who marry.

Are the Japanese the lost ten tribes of Israel? The Jewish World revives this old theory, remarking that it was probably inevitable that they should be sought in the Japanese in view of the fact that the museums of Japan contain numerous engravings purporting to show the landing of Jews in Nippon. One of the pictures cited is said to show a procession in which the ark is discernible and in which the priests wear hats of Biblical pattern. Another depicts Solomon in the act of receiving gifts from the queen of Sheba.

A lake 20 miles long and from three to five miles wide has suddenly sprung into existence in the sand hills of Central Nebraska. Where six months ago there were wastes of mud is now a body of water 10 to 50 feet deep and constantly rising. The overflow has found an outlet and started down the valley toward the Missouri river, forming a stream the length of which no one can imagine. It has been known for years that almost the whole of the central, if not the entire western, part of the state had an underflow of water.

THIN BLOOD—WEAK NERVES

One Follows the Other, but Dr. Williams' Pink Pills Quickly Cure Both.

The steady use of a particular set of muscles [illegible] fatigue, which produces laxity or difficult motion, trembling, cramps and even paralysis. Writers, telegraphers, tailors and seamstresses are among the classes most threatened in this way with the loss of their power to earn a living. The following instance shows that nerve power may be recovered after it seems entirely lost, if the right means are taken. Mrs. O. S. Blackston, of No. 564 North Bowman street, Mansfield, Ohio, says:

"For years my hands would become so numb at times that I would drop anything I attempted to lift. Later they became so bad that I could not sew any longer, and at last I could scarcely do anything at all with my hands. At night the pricking sensations would come on worse than ever, and my hands and arms would pain so that I dreaded to go to bed. My family doctor gave me some nerve tablets. They helped me a little, but only for a short time after I had taken them and if I happened to be without them for a day or two I would be as bad as ever or even worse. Finally I got a box of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and began to take them.

"The result was surprising. By the time I had taken the last pill in my first box I could see a gain. Thanks to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, I am now all right. I can sleep undisturbed by pain, and for two years I have been as well as ever."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills feed the nerves by making new, rich blood and in this way have cured nervous diseases of every description from simple restlessness to paralysis. They have banished the tortures of neuralgia, the weakness of nervous prostration, the disability and awful pain of locomotor ataxia. They are sold by all druggists or direct by the Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

COFFEE NEURALGIA

Leaves When You Quit and Use Postum.

A lady who unconsciously drifted into nervous prostration brought on by coffee, says:

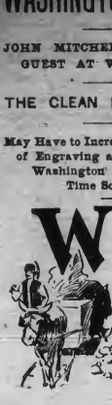
"I have been a coffee drinker all my life, and used it regularly, three times a day.

"A year or two ago I became subject to nervous neuralgia, attacks of nervous headache and general nervous prostration which not only incapacitated me for doing my housework, but frequently made it necessary for me to remain in a dark room for two or three days at a time.

"I employed several good doctors, one after the other, but none of them was able to give me permanent relief.

"Eight months ago a friend suggested that perhaps coffee was the cause of my troubles and that I try Postum Food Coffee and give up the old kind. I am glad I took her advice, for my health has been entirely restored. I have no more neuralgia, nor have I had one solitary headache in all these eight months. No more of my days are wasted in solitary confinement in a dark room. I do all my own work with ease. The flesh that I lost during the years of my nervous prostration has come back to me during these months, and I am once more a happy, healthy woman. I enclose a list of names of friends who can vouch for the truth of the statement." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.



Ten days' trial leaving off coffee and using Postum is sufficient. All grocers.

WASHINGTON LETTER

JOHN MITCHELL A WELCOME GUEST AT WHITE HOUSE.

THE CLEAN MONEY CRAZE

May Have to Increase Force in Bureau of Engraving and Printing—The Washington Home of Old-Time Southerners.

WASHINGTON.—One of the visitors at the white house who has little trouble in getting an audience with the president is John Mitchell, president of the United Mine Workers. Mr. Roosevelt has never forgotten the loyal, honest aid that Mitchell gave him in that historic controversy in the fall of 1902, when the president intervened between the mine owners and mine workers and brought to a close the most expensive and dangerous strike ever inaugurated in the coal fields. The president was struck with Mitchell's honesty of purpose and sincere desire to act upon his own principle of a "square deal" to everybody. It is not too much to say that had the mine workers been represented by a man possessed of less common sense and fair-mindedness the result at that time would have been different.

John Mitchell is not a frequent visitor in Washington, but when he does come to this city he makes it a rule to pay his respects to the president, and he is always welcomed. For the first time he appeared as a politician a few weeks ago. He has made it a rule to keep out of politics and has frequently refused to use his influence with the president in favor of anyone seeking office, but a particular friend of his, who acted as his secretary during the coal strike, Mr. Louis Hammerling, is seeking to be made an internal revenue collector in Pennsylvania, and has enlisted Mitchell's sympathies.

The president likes to talk with Mitchell on many subjects, particularly those relating to labor and labor unions, as he can get from him and from President Gompers, of the Federation of Labor, a more conservative idea of what the workingman wants than comes from the professional agitators. Both these labor leaders have implicit confidence in the president.

Secretary Root and the Press.

SECRETARY OF State Root has fallen into his duties naturally and gracefully. He has been welcomed back to the big state, war and navy building by many of the subordinate government officials who learned to admire his methods and direct business way when he was secretary of war. Mr. Root came to Washington with a good deal of the narrow-mindedness of a New York lawyer, and it is admitted that the men on Manhattan island are about as provincial a set as is to be found in the United States. He brought with him a prejudice against newspaper men, having at times been the victim of writers who cared more for sensation and space than they did for absolute accuracy. He was very cold and distant for some months after he became head of the war department, but gradually he began to recognize the important part that newspaper men at the national capital play in national affairs, and he was not slow in acknowledging their position when he did recognize them.

When Mr. Root came to Washington this month and brought with him Mr. Bacon, first assistant secretary of state, he introduced the latter to a group of newspaper men and proceeded to instruct him as to how he was to treat the press. "These men can be of the utmost assistance to you and to the government if you give them your confidence," said the secretary. "Tell them everything that it is legitimate to make public, and if you tell them what they are not to publish you will find your confidence respected. Start right with the newspaper correspondents and your administration will be successful."

Mr. Root finds himself hampered by an act he did while secretary of war, and the other day laughingly admitted it. "Do you know," he said to a friend, "there is one act of my career as secretary of war I very much regret?"

"Is that so?" the friend inquired.

"Yes; while I was secretary of war," said Mr. Root, "I stole a room from the state department. I wish now I had that room back."

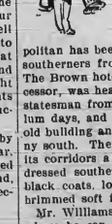
Dirty Dollar Bill.

THE demand for clean money is somewhat embarrassing to the treasury. Officials of that department claim that paper money is being used up too fast. It is being destroyed at the rate of about $2,000,000 a day. This is in response to the agitation for money that is not reeking with disease germs. When John Wesley Gaines, the strenuous congressman from Tennessee, discovered that there were several thousand dangerous germs lurking in a dirty dollar bill people all over the country began to insist on having brand new, crisp currency.

Treasury officials take little stock in the germ theory, and question whether anyone has ever really suffered from a disease contracted in handling old bills. They cite the experience of the money counters in the treasury. Down in the basement of this building there are many women who have been counting money for the past eight or ten years and they handle the very worst bills in circulation. Currency that is not considered fit to remain in use is put up in bundles and sent to Washington for redemption. These bundles must be counted by the women and it is declared that not a single case is on record of disease contagion growing out of handling this money.

The national banks are complaining about the expense they are put to for the printing of new notes in response to this clean money craze. Within the past four years the volume of redemptions have doubled. In 1900 there was redeemed daily about $1,000,000, but now the redemptions run over $2,000,000 each day. It will be necessary to increase the force in the bureau of engraving and printing to keep up with the printing of new notes unless the secretary decides to prolong the life of a bank note and thus reduce the amount that is turned in for redemption.

Task of Signing Name.



IT IS difficult to judge of a man's character and appearance by his handwriting, although it is maintained by some experts that nothing is easier. The signature of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Reynolds is ample proof that no one is able always to judge a man by the way he writes. That signature is a wonder. It resembles a Chinese puzzle in its angularity. It appears like a bunch of triangles fastened together. Mr. Reynolds is proud of his signature and defies anyone to counterfeit it. Its sharp angles would never in the world suggest the jolly, rotund form of the assistant secretary, who is the personification of good nature and good humor. He is just as genial in his character as he is in appearance, and that funny jumble of triangles which he calls his signature is by no means an index to that character.

Mr. Reynolds has the knack of dashing off that Chinese puzzle very readily, and that is the main desideratum in his daily routine of work. Like other assistant secretaries and high government officials, he has to spend two or three hours each day in attaching his name to vouchers, warrants and other important papers. The more rapidly he can sign his name the less irksome is this duty, and Mr. Reynolds has solved the problem. Secretary of the Treasury Shaw writes his name out in full, except he uses the initial for the middle name, but as there are only 11 letters in the whole signature it does not occupy very much time.

President Roosevelt signs his name in full to all documents, writing the "Theodore Roosevelt" in a rather small, straggling hand. When he was assistant secretary of the navy, however, he had so many papers to sign that it was a burden to spell his name in full; so he cut out the "Theodore" and used the initial "T."

"Just look at that," he said to a friend one day. "Isn't that the limit? T. Roosevelt! T. Roosevelt! Isn't that the worst? But I've got to write it that way or get pen paralysis."

Old Metropolitan Hotel.

THE southern colony in the old Metropolitan hotel in Washington will lose one of its shining lights this winter, John Sharp Williams, the democratic leader in the house, has decided to forsake this hostelry and go to house keeping. The Metropolitan has been the home of old-time southerners from time immemorial. The Brown hotel, which was its predecessor, was headquarters for the great statesman from Dixie land in antebellum days, and there still clings to the old building an atmosphere of the sunny south. There are yet to be seen in its corridors a few of the typically-dressed southerners in long-skirted, black coats, low-cut vests and broad-brimmed soft felt hats.

Mr. Williams is looking for a house where he can have more home life than he has enjoyed at the hotel. The brilliant southerner is one of the most absent-minded men, and needs the attention of his good wife. It is related that last winter his wife came from Mississippi to visit him for a couple of weeks, and stopped with him at the Metropolitan. One morning he left her sitting in the room, closed the door and, as he had been in the habit of doing when occupying the room by himself, locked the door.

Mrs. Williams delights to tell how her husband in their early married days had her prepare an elaborate dinner for a party of his lawyer friends, and then came home in the evening without having invited one of them. He had to scurry around at the eleventh hour in order to get a sufficient company to do justice to the splendid meal that had been prepared.

Scripture Authority.—"So Jacob came to Luz, which is in the land of Canaan, that is, Bethel, he and all the people that were with him. And he built there an altar, and called the place El-beth-el; because there God appeared unto him, when he fled from the face of his brother. But Deborah Rebekah's nurse died, and she was buried beneath Bethel under an oak; and the name of it was called Allonbachuth. And God appeared unto Jacob again, when he came out of Padan-aram, and blessed him. And God said unto him, Thy name is Jacob; thy name shall not be called any more Jacob, but Israel shall be thy name; and he called his name Israel."—Gen. 35:6-10.

"YES, this is the very spot, and there is the stone which I set for a pillar after my vision that night," and as Jacob spoke his face beamed with an appreciative light and after a long silence, during which his eyes drank in the old familiar scene, he continued, enthusiastically: "And it was right here, in this hollow rock, that I made my bed. My, how good that hard rock seemed, after the hot, weary journey of the day."

"And is this where God met you and talked with you?" asked Rachel, soberly, looking about her with quickening interest.

"Yes," she exclaimed, fervidly, after a thoughtful pause, and then added, as she placed her hand lovingly within his own: "Tell me the story of thy vision again."

"As I did years ago when we watered thy father's sheep at the well?" he asked, with a smile, and as the flood of tender memories swept over him he drew her close to his side and told again the story of the night spent there so long before.

They had that day reached the memorable spot, and having pitched their tents on the grassy slopes to one side, and as the sun had set and the cool and quiet of the evening hour gave them rest from their labors, Jacob and Rachel had walked out together, and, drawn by an irresistible impulse, Jacob had sought out the place where nearly 30 years before he had passed the night alone. Memory was quickened by each familiar object, and with glowing heart and thrilling voice he rehearsed each detail of that night's experience, while Rachel listened with breathless interest. A new realization and appreciation of God stirred her heart. The old superstitious dread was gone, and in its place there glowed a love and desire for the true God which she had not known or felt before. Looking up with the light of the new faith shining in her eyes, she exclaimed, fervidly:

"Oh, Jacob, how glad I am that I left the images behind. I wonder now at the struggle which it cost to give them up, but oh, how much more God has given in their place."

"Yea, I have found it so, too, my love."

His wife's words struck a responsive chord in his own heart, for there had swept over him like a flood the memory of how, through the years as he had given up his own will and purpose and desires, God had given him more and more of His presence and blessing. They were enjoying a common experience, and it drew their hearts together in a new and deeper bond of sympathy.

"As I have heard you speak of the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and of thy God," she continued, earnestly, "I have thought of Him as only belonging to them and to thee, but now I can say that the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob is my God, and I am so happy."

Jacob leaned over and tenderly kissed her upturned face, and his arm which encircled her waist pressed her more closely to him, but in that sacred moment he spoke not a word. They understood. Heart spoke to heart in its own expressive language, which needs no interpretation and knows no lack.

"My love," Jacob said, at last, half playfully, "wouldest thou linger here all night, thinking to see the vision of the ladder and the angels?"

"Nay," she said, softly, as they turned and walked slowly towards their tents; "there has been vision of God in my heart this night, which is better. Surely the house of God hath been filled with His presence."

"Yea," responded Jacob as the dark outlines of the tents came into view and the hum of voices and the bleating and lowing of the sheep and cattle broke upon their ears, "and let us share with the rest the blessing which we have received. To-morrow we will build an altar to our God, and offer sacrifices for all the people. Thus shall Bethel be for all more truly the house of God, and the gate of Heaven."

The next morning, as Jacob was gathering the stones with the help of his sons for the building of the altar, he told them the story of his vision there and of God's word to him.

"And this stone," he explained, as they placed it on top of the rude pile, "is the one on which I rested my head that night, and which I set as a memorial, pledging God that if He would be with me, and keep me, and give me bread to eat and raiment to put on, and bring me again to this place in peace, that He should be my God."

"And He has, hasn't He, father?" spoke up Joseph, a lad of some 14 years, who had been listening almost breathlessly as his father related the experiences of long ago. And then, without waiting for his father to reply, he added, impulsively: "And He shall be my God, too."

"Well spoken, my lad," said the father, warmly, patting him on the head. "Thy brothers here may well follow thy example."

There was no response to this challenge, and Jacob was too busily engaged in the preparations for the sacrifice to take note of the shadow which passed over the faces of the older boys. Already there was beginning to creep into their hearts a feeling of jealousy towards the son of Rachel. It needed no very observing eye to discover the deeper affection which the father felt towards the only son of his beloved wife, and to have him held up before their eyes as an examnle made them angry.

But all joined in the solemn service, and everyone, the wives and children, the servants and their families, and the women and children who had been taken captive at Shechem, were present as Jacob offered the sacrifices of the best of the sheep and the cattle upon the altar.

Even the aged Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah, Jacob's mother, who when she had heard that Jacob had returned to Canaan insisted on making the journey to the place where he was sojourning, was there, having been carried up the rocky path to the place before the altar. Jacob, having finished making the offerings, proclaimed to all assembled that the God whom they worshiped that day was the only God, the true God of Heaven.

"He it was," he went on to declare, "who spoke to me in this place as I fled and said: 'I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed; and thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south; and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed. And behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of.' And God has done all that He has promised, and will yet fulfill His word in respect to the inheritance of the land. Only fear God and obey Him."

As Jacob finished and the assembled people stood in reverent silence—even the babes in the arms of their mothers seeming to feel the influence of the solemn occasion and stilling their cries—the clear, shrill voice of Deborah was heard, saying:

"Hear ye the words of Jacob. Now do I understand the words spoken to Rehekah by God concerning Jacob, saying that he should be stronger than his brother Esau. Stronger in faith, and mightier in power with God. Unto him has come the blessing promised Abraham because by faith he has claimed it from God. Ah, that Rebekah had lived to see this hour."

Again silence fell and the people continued with bowed heads while the smoke of the sacrifice rose heavenward. All at once on the outskirts of the company a sob was heard, and presently there appeared a Shechemite woman with her two children, a boy and girl, making her way towards the altar. As she came before Jacob she bowed herself to the ground, and then cried:

"'God's blessing for all the families of the earth,' did you say? May not that blessing reach even me? May not the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, be my God? I would have my children grow up to know the true God."

Was there given Jacob in that moment the faintest glimpse of the perfect sacrifice which was to make one all people in Christ Jesus? Was it the consciousness of his own guilt and need and God's mercy towards him? Whatever it was, Jacob's heart responded to the appeal, and he replied, pointing to the slain lamb on the altar:

"Through the sacrifice we all have acceptance with God. If thine heart is right toward Him He will receive thee."

Deeply impressed by all the stirring incidents of the afternoon, the company departed, and as Deborah was borne back to her tent, she remarked to Jacob:

"Surely, it has been good to be here, God hath met with us this day. Now shall my spirit depart in peace, for mine eyes have beheld a foregleam of the promised blessing."

And that night the vision of angels was Deborah's portion, and with the angels her spirit ascended to the presence of God, and all that they found resting in her tent the next morning was the lifeless body, and on her face the smile that was left there when she greeted her Heavenly visitors and gladly joined them in their upward flight. And they carried her to the oak beneath which she had sat the day before, and there with many tears and much weeping, they buried her, and Jacob called the name of the place Allonbachuth, that is, the oak of weeping, and as he lingered there after the others had gone, pondering deeply over the wonderful experiences of the past few days, God appeared unto him and said:

"Thy name is Jacob: thy name shall not be called any more Jacob, but Israel shall be thy name: and He called his name Israel."

"And I shall strive to be no longer Jacob, the supplanter," he responded, fervidly, "but Israel, the prince of God."

BOONE CO. RECORDER.
Wednesday, - - Oct., 18, 1905.
W. L. RIDDELL. - - Publisher.

"While this board is using and urging every reasonable precaution against yellow fever, we insist that other diseases which attract little public notice are of far more practical importance to our people. Sickness is of real importance to any people, aside from their unreasoning fears, as it affects their sick and death rate. Typhoid fever, for instance, an easily preventable filth disease, causes more deaths in Kentucky every month than yellow fever has done in all the years since Daniel Boone made his first visit. During the year 1903, the last one for which the figures have been compiled, with several counties making no reports for lack of data, it was found that we had a total 13,305 cases, with 1,579 deaths, as against 1,568 cases of the yellow fever in New Orleans during the present epidemic, with 222 deaths. Considered purely as an epidemic problem, the feature of it first thought of by most people, typhoid fever is as important to Kentucky as yellow fever is to Louisiana, because typhoid fever is one of our every-day domestic pestilences. To show this more fully at the conservative estimate by our various boards in 1903, some of them entirely too low, the cost of caring for those sick of typhoid fever was $3,750. It is universally conceded that no State has any more valuable asset than that represented in its vigorous population. As this disease is confined practically to persons in the prime of life, who can contribute most to the public wealth and prosperity, those who die of it constitute a direct and irreparable loss to the Commonwealth. Political economists place a commercial value of $1,000 on each healthy immigrant coming to this country. Placing the same value upon each of the much higher class victims of typhoid fever in Kentucky each year, gives us a definite loss of $1,579,000. Adding this to the cost of caring for those sick of it, as figured above, we have a loss in one year, an average one, of $2,542,780. The loss from consumption is far greater even than this, while that from diphtheria, scarlet fever and other similar diseases is large. As the same general principles of sanitation—cleanliness, disinfection and notification—as precautions against yellow fever, will be effective against these still more generally prevalent and fatal diseases it is only the more important that their adoption shall be made universal, and that in doing this the health authorities shall have the co-operation of every good citizen.—Extract from address by Kentucky State Board of Health.

Bitterly Opposed to Them.

UNION, KY., Oct. 10, 1905.

Editor of the Recorder:

As a life-long citizen of Boone county, and one deeply interested in the welfare of her people, I wish, through the columns of your paper, to give some of my views in regard to the question now being agitated by our people—free turnpikes,

I am bitterly opposed to them for several reasons.

First, I object on account of the character of some of the petitioners. One petition circulated in the western part of the county was signed by 39 voters, two of whom are taxpayers Thirty-seven of them do not represent thirty-seven dollars State or county taxes. I do not know, but am of the opinion that of the 400 petitioners in the county about the same proportion of taxpayers and nontaxpayers are represented. It is so easy to get a man to sign a petition when it costs him nothing. Oh! shame on a man who would vote a tax on his neighbor when he does not pay any taxes himself. The principles of common honesty should deter him. I know men who pay no taxes, and, perhaps, not 5 cents toll in a year, who are strong advocates of free turnpikes.

When the taxpaying voters of this county want free turnpikes they will certainly have them; but I think it will be a great mistake then. I have not been very successful, financially, but with fifty years experience I have made mistakes and seen the mistakes of others. One of the greatest mistakes I have seen men make was to involve themselves with debts that they were unable to pay, ending in bankruptsy and ruin. I have known counties to do the same thing.

If the voters of Boone county decide in favor of free turnpikes, and to build other pikes, it will become necessary to issue bonds in large amounts, and year after year to fix the rate of taxation for road purposes at 25 cents on the $100, and the interest on the bonds and the amount of money misapplied will exceed the original debt, and the people will groan under the debt and have but little better roads than at present.

If our fiscal court will increase the county levy for road purposes from to 12½ or 15 cents on the $100, and require the money to be expended for hauling and putting stone in the mudholes, in a few years we will have fairly good roads and nobody eaten up with tax. Our roads are steadily improving under the present law, and with the small increase of the county levy heretofore suggested, properly applied, we will have as good roads as we need.

I will close by asking a question or two, which someone will please answer: What will it cost to buy the toll roads now in the county? What will it cost, annually, to keep them in their present high condition?

M. C. NORMAN.

"Lowtax" Again.

VERONA, Ky., October 13, 05.

In this week's Recorder Mr. Kenedy was prevailed upon to answer the communication of Lowtax. His laborious answer is, in part, a confession of said communication. He admits that public improvements cost more than like improvements by an individual. He admits it would place an indetebdness upon the county. He virtually admits that the pikes would become worse, for he says he has traveled extensively over six counties, and the roads are about the same as they were before they were free, "About the same condition" does not mean that they are in the same. It may mean that they are a little worse or a little better. If they are better does anyone believe that Mr. Kennedy would have failed to have told us so? He uses much of his spaee arguing that good roads are a good thing. No one will deny that, but when he uses good roads and free turnpikes as synonymous terms, he falls into error. If they are the same, then the great free turnpikes of Boone, of which I have often heard, namely, the Woolper pike, must be by this time a grand boulevard, indeed. He says "Lowtax does not want to pay tax nor toll." I admit Mr. Kennedy has many accomplishments, but I did not know he possesses power of mind reading or clarivoyance. Mr. K. says his tax would be more than his toll. I always believed that there are angels upon earth, but never believed that any of them ride astride, and I owe Mr. Kennedy a chromo for finding one of the masculine gender. But it may be he has possessions somewhere in the back country to which he would like the county to build him a mcadamized road, and thus the improvement to his possessions would far exceed his taxes. But I trust this is not the case, for I would not like to see this picture of selfsacrifice effaced. I live on a dirt road, and I appeal to all others who are in like condition, would it be just to tax a man who lives on a pike, and who, virtually, built the same, to pay more per acre towards building us pikes than we pay ourselves, while we get the benefits? He says "that he judges from the closing remarks of Lowtax that if the county would build him a pike he would become as dishonest and as hypocritical as those who vote for free turnpikes." God forbid! The fact is in my closing remarks I made the statement that the whole thing is wrong." He says I "probably never read the law." If I understand the law, voting free turnpikes in a county does not necessarily make them free, nor does it build a foot of new road. The 25 cent tax would be only a fund to juggle with. Bonds would have to be issued, and before said issue a vote would have to be taken, and a two-thirds majority of the votes cast would authorize a fiscal court to issue them. Does any sane man believe that Boone county will so vote? There is no doubt but there are men in the county whose conscience tells them that to vote a tax upon the people for their benefit is wrong, and while they are willing to receive the benefits, they will not vote for a thing so unjust. I desire to say to these men to go and vote against this free blow system, and they will think more of themselves for so doing. I may be an old fogy—I may be "unprogressive," and if taking from a man his money for my benefit, thus robbing the housewife of her new bonnet, and the blue-eyed tot of her Cristmas doll be unprogressive, I plead guilty to the indictment. Verily what strides has Progress made since Christ was here teaching, "Peace on Earth an Good Will to Men."

A large crowd of colored people assembled at Felecia Utz's, last Saturday evening to witness the marriage of her son Ed, who brought his bride out from the city to marry at the home of his mother. Shortly after a bountiful supper had received the attention of the guests, a charivari party appeared, and with guns, pistols, bells and horns, made the night hideous for a while. It was the largest colored wedding the old town has had in a long time.

Recent examinations of the records of Fairfax county, Virginia, showed that George Washington owned 50,000 acres of land when 27 years old and at the fall slaughtering in 1770 the Washington family killed 150 hogs for their use. The examination also brought out the facts that in 1787 the Father of His Country sowed 589 acres in grass, 400 acres in oats, 700 acres in wheat and 700 acres in other grains. He owned 140 horses, 112 cows and 500 sheep and 250 negroes on the plantation.

A lady decided to scare her husband, who was quite a hard drinker, so he would reform. In order to do this she procured a costume of the devil he had worn at a masquerade. The next time the erring spouse came home feeling happy she quickly donned the costume. As he opened the door she stepped forward and said in a sepulchral voice: "Come with me—I am the devil!" The result rather startled her, as the response which greeted her was: "Zat so? Shake, ol' boy, I'm your brother-in-law; I married your sister!"

Dedication of Concord Baptist Church Sunday, October 22d.

The members of Concord Baptist church have just completed their new building, which is the third one on the same grounds within 50 years. The first building was burned shortly after its completion, and the second, a large frame building, was poorly constructed on a faulty foundation, and became unsafe, hence the necessity for a new building.

Concord Baptist church was constituted on September 4th, 1856. They have always been a diligent, working membership, paying promptly their ministry, and to missions and to keep up incidental expenses. The church has been greatly reduced by so many old members dying, and a large number of others moving away and taking letters, so that the present effort is a great burden on a faithful few.

They have helped every church within many miles of them. We hope every public spirited citizen and all Christian people will rally to their dedication and lend them a helping hand with liberal contributions.

An all-day service, dinner on the ground for everybody. The exercises will be conducted by Rev. J. W. Beagle, of Latonia, and Rev. L. Johnson, of Walton, Ky. All visiting preachers and all denominations will receive a hearty welcome. Come, everybody.

BASE BALL.

The Grays journeyed to Walton again last Saturday, where they played the team of that place an exciting and interesting game. Turner and Ryan for Walton, and Piatt and Sandford and Slayback, for the Grays were the batteries. White's catch in center field was the feature of the game. Following is the score:

Grays	1	1	1	0	1	0	0	1	0	—5
Walton	2	4	0	2	0	0	0	0	*	—8

Base hits—Jackson, Slayback, Smith, Piatt; Ryan 2, Holder 2.

Two base hits—Jackson, Slayback, Rockwell White, Sandford; Byland, Turner.

Three base hit—Smith.

Struck out—By Turner 7; by Piatt 7.

Total hits—Grays 10; Walton 6.

The Boones and the Hebron ball team hooked up here last Saturday afternoon in a genuine slugging match in which each of the pitchers, Conner and Walton, were touched up for 13 hits. The features of the game were a fine stop made by the Hebron third baseman, Souther's running scoop of a grounder to Brady on second, and Bullock's home run drive over the left field fence. In the ninth inning when the Hebron rooters were sure of victory Bullock took their breath by capturing a nice fly and retiring their side and also their hopes of victory. Ernst, Phelps Walton, Mike Clore and the stranger at third, were the strength of the visitors. Following is the score:

Boones	1	0	0	1	0	0	2	1	1	—6
Hebron	1	0	0	0	1	0	0	0	3	—5

Hits—Boones 13; Hebron 13.

Two base hit—Conner. Home run—Bullock. Errors—Boones 2; Hebron 5.

The Boones and the Grays will play next Saturday afternoon. The Grays are confident that they will defeat the Boones and are delighted at the idea of having a chance to go up against them.

[Dedicated to the Aurora Indepeudent.]

Well, for lands sake, Bro. Cobb,
You have got this thing all in a gob.
You say you always play first fiddle,
Well all I said was hey, diddle, diddle.
We tutored Houston to all he knows,
And we didn't keep him as the record shows.
The reason why, we wish to say,
He wasn't good enough to chew our hay.
We'll see you again in 1906,
And give you a chance to turn your tricks,
And if you don't we hope you'll say,
The Boones again took our scalps away.

L. H. C.

Much is said and written concerning the feeding of fowls, but I wish to say a word concerning their treatment. I agree with other writers in regard to feeding, that in order for hens to lay well they need a variety of good food, but another important item is to treat them kindly, never frighten them, have your hens so that you can go among them without their showing any fear. If you don't believe this affects their laying, just try a flock of hens that may be laying well and go among them or let some stranger get them nervous and scared; keep it up a few days and see how your eggs will fall off. I have a nice flock of buff pullets, and can go among them and feed perfectly at ease. My flock of Wyandotts are so tame I have to be careful and not step on them; eating out of my hands or dish, they know I am their friend and feel contented and happy in my presence. I would impress upon all who keep a large or small flock of fowls to aim at having them tame so they will not start at the approach of even a stranger. Kindness is far better for all animal creation. It pays in more ways than one to be kind.—Ex.

Last Saturday a jolly crowd was entertained at the hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Kreylich, near Idlewild. The object was to go nutting, but the baskets seemed painfully empty when they returned. Nevertheless they spent a most enjoyable day. Such a dinner and such appetites are seldom seen. The afternoon was spent in the parlor, where the girls made themselves quite famous with music, recitations, cake walking, etc. Then they formed a lovely (?) group and had their pictures taken. After having quite an interesting game of ball, the party decided to proceed homeward, each saying they had never enjoyed a day so much. All received a hearty invitation to come again next fall, which we fear will be too great a temptation to resist. Three cheers for Mr. and Mrs. K., who make everyone so welcome in their lovely country home. Those who enjoyed the day were Mesdames W. L. Riddell, M. L. Riddell, G. G. Hughes, Bert Gaines, and Misses Katie and Terese Runyan, Susan Roberts, Hettie Riddell, Nell Martin, Edna Cowen, Artie Hughes, Charlotte Hall, Cathryne Gaines, Essie Parish, May Huey, Jennie Blythe, Laura Porter, Grace Bullock, Margaret Hughes and Laura Frances Riddell, and Messrs. Rice Clore and Jonas Stephens.

Miss Mattie Kreylich bids fair to make as charming a hostess as her mother.

Mrs. Clarissa Ashley's will was probated in the county court, last Friday, and S. L. Webb, of Erlanger qualified as executor. An appeal was taken to the circuit court.

Last Wednesday was a regular March day down on Gunpowder, where people were treated to a general mix up of wind, rain, hail and snow, a combination which was a foretaste of what is expected later on.

The Petersburg voting precinct is about all the local issues to dispose of at the next election that the voters down there can stand. The stock law and the free turnpike questions are agitating the minds of the people in that section of the county as they are seldom agitated.

The Harrodsburg Herald says: "Last spring Claude Chambers ordered some roasting ear corn of the 'Mexican June' variety. The stalks of this corn are now from 18 to 24 feet high and each stalk bears four big ears, and he will get about 24 barrels off the one acre he planted. He has not served a grain of it on his table, it being so fine and the yield so immense that he would rather distribute it among the farmers."

REVOLT OF REPUBLICANS.

Burning Issues Which Tend to Create Trouble Among Standpatters.

Out in Iowa, where the "idea" was born, that the tariff fosters trusts, some of the republican leaders are talking to the people very plainly. At the Old Settlers' association of central Iowa, which recently held its thirty-fifth annual reunion, Hon. Tom J. Bray, chairman of the republican party in Poweshiek county, delivered an address in which he said:

"For political purposes the 'system' is divided into two branches, the railroad combination and the American Protective league.

"I will take up first the operation of the railroad branch of the 'system,' which is entrusted with the nomination of county and state officials, congressmen and United States senators. The railroads, by means of the unlimited amount of free transportation which they can issue, are in a position to wield a powerful influence in politics, and they never permit a single ounce of this influence to go to waste. A little slip of yellow paper properly authenticated by a railroad company, has a purchasing power in politics, compared to which the expenditure of a large sum of money would be insignificant. I believe that the majority of American men are not susceptible to bribes, but at the same time we are an exceedingly grateful people, and always inclined to return a favor for a favor. The delegate who receives a free pass to a convention thereby places himself under an obligation to the donor of the pass, and he discharges this obligation by voting for candidates for office whom, under any other circumstances, he would consider unworthy of his support.

"Under the railroad system of conducting politics a thorough organization is maintained in each state. This organization is directed and managed by the general attorney of the largest railway system in the state, who is selected, not because of the legal ability which he possesses, but because of his knowledge of political tactics. In each town and city he appoints one or more local attorneys, who earn their salaries by distributing free transportation among the influential citizens of the community, and especially the edelegates to state and congressional conventions. The delegates to these conventions accept the free passage because it saves an expenditure of money. When they reach the city where the convention is being held the gentleman who furnished the transportation requests them to vote for a certain man for congressman, governor, railroad commissioner, or some other state office. The favor is granted, and men are nominated who have in reality been selected by the railroad political boss.

"The congressman, upon being elected, finds that his most important duty is the appointment of postmasters in his district. In most instances the editor of the local newspaper gets the appointment. He is glad to accept the office because of the salary which goes with it, and the congressman is glad to have him accept it because the editor is in a position to perform valuable services for the congressman through the columns of the newspaper.

"The editor feels under obligations for the appointment and, of course, he would not be ungrateful enough to decline to perform any service requested by his benefactor. The congressman, being indebted to the railroads for his nomination and being indebted to the American Protective league for special favors shown him at Washington, is a tool in the hands of the 'system;' the postmaster-editor for the reasons I have mentioned is a tool in the hands of the congressman, and the people are tools in the hands of the postmaster-editor. He writes their political gospel, and they generally accept it without suspicion."

Mr. Bray continued by describing how the railroads in league with the republican leaders packed caucuses and conventions and elected congressmen, legislators and governors, who were pledged to do the will of the "railroad boss."

It must be remembered that this republican official was talking to his neighbors and friends, and the report says his speech was received with great enthusiasm. As the republican leaders in congress declare they will not revise the tariff and any railroad rate legislation that will prevent unreasonable rates from being charged is likely to be defeated; these republican reformers who are largely in the minority in their own party will have to join hands with the democrats to secure reform legislation.

——Secretary Shaw would have us believe that low prices and high deficits go hand in hand.—Washington Post.

——The general opinion seems to be that the senate will pass some kind of rate regulation measure—most probably the railroad kind.—Detroit Free Press.

——The secretary of agriculture predicts lower prices for the necessities of life. He may be no better as a forecaster than the weather officials, but he, at least, has the tact to forecast what the people want.—Buffalo Express.

——We would call President Roosevelt's attention to the fact that the Panama canal managers are quite active in digging into what remains of the appropriation in the treasury, but rather lax about making the dirt fly.

——The holders of life insurance policies have been handsome contributors to republican campaign funds, and when further investigation shows what the trusts and the railroads gave to "the cause," the wonder will be that there were as many honest voters as the returns show voted for the democratic candidates for the past few years.

RICH AND POOR FARMERS.

Profits Cut Down by Contributions to the Up-Building of the Trusts.

"The American farmer is the real Monte Cristo. The world is his," says the Washington Post, after stating that the value of the direct earth products for the present year will far exceed $5,000,000,000. Without stopping to dispute the enormous figures, the production of the statistical bureau of the agricultural department, which is somewhat under a cloud since the scandals therein; yet the Post and other optimistic souls must remember there were, according to the census reports 5,737,372 farmers in the United States in 1899, and there may be more now, to divide this sum between. That only gives on the average each farmer less than $872 and from that he has to pay his hired help, new machinery or repairs to old, his grocery bills, his clothing, taxes, insurance, perhaps interest on a mortgage, doctor bills and many other minor expenses that will cost a good many dollars during the year. After paying all these expenses how much remains to make the average farmer feel like Monte Cristo. The editor of the Post, who cogitates over the wealth of the farmer at the sweltest Washington club, would find that the surplus of the average farmer, after paying for necessities—not luxuries—would not pay for what the bookkeeper of the club has him charged with for one week as simple luxuries.

It is safe to say that with the trust high prices that the tariff fosters, on agricultural machinery, on groceries, on clothing, on furniture, on household utensils and about everything else the farmer buys and the high taxes, that the railroad corporations party escape, but which the farmer has to pay, that the average farmer just about makes both ends meet.

That conclusion is forced upon one by the figures of the last census, which state that in 1899 there were 53,353 farmers who, after feeding their live stock, had nothing left to sell; 167,493 farmers who had less than $50 worth of products after feeding their stock; 1,247,446 had less than $100; 1,247,446 less than $250; 1,602,375 less than $500, and 1,378,539 less than $1,000. Those may be called the average farmers.

But when it comes to the rich farmers the figures jump the wrong way, as far as the number of Monte Cristo farmers, for there were but 829,142 farmers who had a value of product of $1,000 and under $2,500; and all the remaining farmers in the United States—153,829 in number—had $2,500 and over when the stock had been fed. Those were the Monte Cristo's, but how few in comparison to the whole number.

There is no doubt that the average farmer would be making a fair profit if the trusts could not charge him their enormous profits on what he is compelled to buy and this the trusts are fostered in doing by the tariff, which protects them and does not protect the farmers. Why, the steel trust alone makes $140,000,000 a year, of which $100,000,000 is extra profit that comes through the tariff. The farmers, the rich ones and the poor ones all pay a large share of that enormous profit. The Standard Oil, the sugar, the tobacco, the glass, the salt and hundreds of other trusts are similar vampires, feeding on the $500,000,000,000 made by the farmers with the sweat of their brow. It has been estimated that 40 per cent. of the profits of the farmers goes to enrich the trusts and yet many farmers vote the republican ticket and "stand pat" while the trusts plunder them.

If any average farmer finds he is not able to save much or anything, after paying his bills, let him investigate the trust prices he is paying and the tariff schedules that protects the trusts in charging those high prices. If he is a republican, let him ask his representative in congress and the senators who represent his state, why they don't revise this tariff, which is allowing him to be plundered by corporations. If their answers are truthful they would be compelled to say that the trusts help the republican party and therefore the party protects the trusts and lets the tariff alone.

THE BUMPER WHEAT YIELD OF CANADA.

100,000,000 Bushels of Wheat from 4,000,000 Acres of Land.

In order to secure the attention of the reader to any special article that is brought before the public, it is often the custom to lead the reader on by the introduction of an interesting story until, by one bold jump, he is introduced to the subject that it is desired shall be brought to his notice. This is not fair to the reader, and it is not the intention to do that in this article. It will discuss in the briefest way "Western Canada" and its possibilities for settlement. For the past three or four years the Government of the Dominion of Canada has talked of the resources of Western Canada to the readers of this and thousands of other papers throughout the United States. The quality of the soil was spoken of, the large area of fertile lands was discussed, the possibilities of the country as a grain-growing district were talked of, and the story of the success of farmers from the United States was told. The story is not yet an old one. The two hundred thousands from the United States, who have made Western Canada their home, who have taken advantage of the 160 acres of land that the Government gives free to actual settlers are telling the story to-day to their friends. They have proven the statements made through these columns, and by the Government Agents. They have produced from their land twenty, thirty, forty and more bushels of wheat to the acre, and netted profits ranging from three to ten and more dollars on every acre tilled. They have found the climate fully as good as they were told it would be, schools were convenient and easily organized, railways were not far distant, and markets close at hand. The social conditions were such as they chose to make them, and law and order were observed. Many of them bought land, because it was low-priced and good, and hundreds of cases could be cited where the purchase price of the land was paid out of the first crop. The writer knows of cases this year where the farmer, as a result of the yield on his farm, was put in a position that would enable him to increase his holdings three extra acres for every acre cropped and pay cash for it. Is it any wonder that one grows enthusiastic when speaking about Western Canada.

But what may be said of this year? We are now in a position to speak regarding it. The conditions throughout Manitoba and the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have been remarkably favorable. Had conditions been no better than in past years there would have been every cause for congratulation. We find, though, all previous records broken, and that from a four million acre crop of wheat there will be one hundred million bushels of a yield—or 25 bushels to the acre. Could anything better be desired? Covering the entire country the same splendid reports are being received. The following dispatch was sent by Mr. F. W. Thompson, Vice President of the Ogilvie Milling Co., one of the most careful grain men in America:

"Have just returned from covering several hundred miles of the crop district. I never saw anything like it in this country before. The average yield and quality far exceeds our earlier expectations. It is an immense crop. The weather is extremely favorable." Up to three weeks ago it was Mr. Thompson's opinion that the crop would not reach general expectations.

F. W. Thompson sends another telegram from Winnipeg to-night, saying that his estimate of the wheat crop is now one hundred million bushels. Before he went west he thought it would fall considerably short of that figure.

The moral of this story is that there should be no hesitation in making a decision if you wish to better your condition; or, if you have a family of boys that you wish to become settled on farms, it is a safe proposition to call upon the nearest authorized Canadian Government Agent, and get particulars as to most suitable districts and railway rates.

"GENERAL" FOR 25 CENTS

The Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway is distributing a very beautiful lithograph, 18x25 inches, of the famous engine "General" which is now on exhibition in the Union Depot, Chattanooga, Tenn. The picture is ready for framing and will be mailed to any address for twenty-five cents. The "General" was captured by the Andrews' Raiders at Big Shanty (now Kennesaw), Georgia, on the Western & Atlantic Railroad, April 12th, 1862, and was recaptured by Conductor W. A. Fuller, Anthony Murphy and others, near Ringgold, Ga., after an exciting chase of about ninety miles. It was one of the most thrilling exploits of the Civil War. The object of the raid was to burn the bridges on the Western & Atlantic Railroad and cut off the Confederate Army from its base of supplies. VENTILATION IN DAIRY BARN

System Which Will Render a Stable Which Is Not Too Old Perfectly Sanitary.

Many farmers do not seem to appreciate the difference between ventilation and sanitation. There is little use of spending money for ventilating flues in an old, filthy, plank-floor barn. Usually in such places liquid manure has soaked through the floors for years, while the ceilings are open and covered with cobwebs. Such a stable as this gets change of air, but the filth is so great that it is always offensive. Ventilation is not an antidote for uncleanliness.

Probably nine out of ten stables feel quickly the effect of a strong wind or a lowering of temperature. Nothing except thorough insulation or double walls will remedy this trouble. The cement floor should cover the barn sills, so that ingress of air cannot take place at the bottom; a ceiling made of narrow matched lumber, with a few cracks or knot holes, will defeat the good effects of the system, as the warm air in the upper part of the room passes out rapidly through the small openings. The side walls should have a double air space, to prevent moisture condensation and, in extremely cold weather, frost. If a thermometer is placed near a frosted window, the difference in temperature from the center of the room may be as high as ten degrees. The same conditions exist near a single, solid, board wall. Not so marked, of course, because the wood is not as good a conductor as glass.

Two dead-air spaces will practically shut off all chance for heat radiation and the inside boarding will be as warm as any portion of the room. While I have no experience with a cow stable having straw stuffed between the inside and outside walls, I believe it a safe thing. Several years' use of a henhouse so constructed leads me to advise it for a cow stable. With concrete floor and wall there will be no trouble from rats.

About seven pounds of water are thrown off daily from the skin and lungs of an averaged-sized cow. Therefore, there is a large volume of water to carry out through the flues. The secret, says H. E. Cook, in American Agriculturist, is to keep this moisture in the form of vapor until it reaches the open air. Carrying away moisture is not the only function of perfect ventilation. If the moisture is removed, carbonic acid gas will go with it.

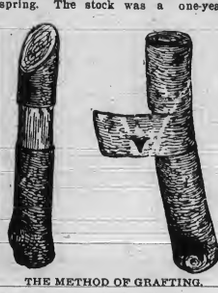
The principle of the King system of ventilation is shown in the illustrations given herewith. Fig. 1 exhibits the outflow flues, and Fig. 2 the intakes. I have this system in use in my dairy barns. When these barns were built I supposed that no other form was practical. Observation has taught me that if the principles of construction from the floor to a point above the highest ridge of the barn are followed, it will make little or no difference whether the flues are placed outside or inside, providing they are sufficiently insulated to prevent the cooling of the air current within them.

Wood, being a non-conductor of heat, is the most satisfactory material for making flues. In constructing them within the building, I used only one solid wall, made of two thicknesses of match boards with tar paper between. The wall was perfectly tight and no side air currents could form, interfering with the circulation. These flues must be as well built as a chimney. In fact the whole principle works like a great box stove, with perfect draft and pipe.

Cut Up the Silage.

I have had a silo for eight years. For seven years I put the silage in the silo whole. Last year I bought a gasoline engine and a cutter with a blower and filled my silo with less expense than in former years. I was much pleased with the way it kept. I think the silage was worth almost double what it was when put in whole. I raise yellow corn for the silo; when glazed pick off the best ears, and cut off the rest into the silo. This is all the grain my stock get and they winter well.—Farm and Home.

FRUIT TREE NOURISHMENT.



What Is Taken Out of the Ground in Growing and Maturing the Fruit.

The Cornell experiment station bulletin No. 103 on "Soil Depletion in Respect to the Care of Fruit Trees," shows that the plant food contained in 20 crops of apples of 15 bushels per tree, and 35 trees per acre, when the leaves that are formed are also taken into the calculation, amounts to 1,337 pounds of nitrogen, 310 pounds of phosphoric acid and 1,895 pounds of potash. Prof. Voorhees shows that 20 years' continuous cropping with wheat, assuming an average crop of 15 bushels per acre, and seven pounds of straw to three bushels of wheat, would remove 660 pounds of nitrogen, 211 pounds of phosphoric acid and 324 pounds of potash. We can thus compare the results of 20 years' cropping of apples, after the production of trees, capable of bearing such crops, has taken large amounts of plant food from the soil, for the 20 years' cropping of apples has removed more than twice as much nitrogen, half as much again of phosphoric acid, and three times as much potash as the wheat crops during the same period. It is evident, then, that an orchard will far more rapidly deplete the fertility of the soil than the continuous cropping in wheat. Any farmer will understand that 20 years' continuous cropping in wheat would be bad farming and would result in soil depletion. How much more then does the continuous cropping in apples depiete the soil. Burn the hardwood of an apple tree and you will fully understand the amount of potash removed from the soil in the wood alone.

The Methods Used by Two Horticulturists with Satisfactory Results.

Referring to grafting English walnut on Black walnut, writes a correspondent of the Rural New Yorker, I would say I did it successfully last spring. The stock was a one-year seedling. Tongue-graft was the style used. I have tried top-grafting larger trees, but without success. I have been told that top-grafting proved successful near Moorestown, N. J. Can anyone in that vicinity give us a report?

In response to this question Mrs. J. Kay says: Take a small limb on J. Kay says: Take a small limb on it, girdle it around with a bud in it, then go to Black walnut tree and girdle it where you want to insert the bud. Now remove the bark and fit the bark from the English walnut neatly into the stock; tie it up with a string until you find the saps have united. The bud will be dormant till next spring. The diagram explains the process.

POINTERS FOR DAIRYMEN.

Soft, white butter comes from hot cream.

Milk quiety, cleanly, quickly. Cows hate haste.

Too much sourness in cream causes white specks in butter.

Keep the fresh, warm milk separate from the old. It keeps better.

Test your milk. It is not quantity so much as the qaality that counts.

Keep the heifer, intended for the dairy, in thrifty, growing condition.

If you are buying new milk utensils, see that all joints are smoothly soldered.

Set milk after milking before it becomes as cool as the atmosphere. The cream will rise better.

Have the milk for the calves sweet and of the same temperature as when it comes from the cow.

Give the cows plenty of pumpkins. If fed with the grain ration they will increase the milk flow.

The nervous, restless cow, always tossing her head, should be dehorned before she hurts somebody or something.

Habits of milking and feeuing are established when the heifer has her first calf. She should be very carefully handled at this time.

Remember that the manure from a single animal is worth about $20 a year. Don't let it waste in the barnyard or under the eaves.

To protect milk and butter from ants, roaches, bugs, mice, etc., swinging shelves may be suspended from the cellar ceiling by wires.

Mulch in Spring.

A mulch in the spring is useful for several reasons. It keeps the ground from drying out and baking in the surface, which results in harm to the young and tender root system. A more equable temperature is secured. This is a point which does not receive as much attention as it should. A warm sun will raise the temperature of the bare ground several degrees during the day, only to be cooled off at night. Such changes are not good for tender plants. A straw mulch will also keep down weeds.

Willie's Reasoning.

Willie, a nine-year-old Westport boy, was laboriously reading the paper, and had just finished perusing an account of a meeting of the National Firemen's association.

"Mamma," he asked, "do firemen go to Heaven?"

"Of course, Willie, if they're good," replied his mother.

"I should think," came from the boy, a moment later, "that the good ones ud be needed most in the other place."—Kansas City Star.

Talk of Their Ills.

A German publicist who spent a part of the summer in a boarding house at Teignmouth, England, says: "English seaside visitors display most remarkable ingenuity in sustaining a lengthy conversation founded on no other topic than the weather. When this is exhausted they turn to their aches and pains, each individual adduces some striking examples of bodily suffering on his or her part and the combined ailments of the company afford themes for endless discussion."

Propitiate the Snakes.

A queer ceremony is performed every year on the eighth day of September in the Valle Maggio, Lombardy, Italy. The region abounds in vipers. The celebrants form into a weird procession, each person, man, woman and child, carrying a huge figure of a snake stuffed with cotton. As they pass along they weep and lament, believing that by the expiatory ceremony they will render themselves proof against snake bites during the grape gathering.

Mixed Family.

A typical South African household, described by Olive Schreiner, had an English father, a half Dutch mother with a French name, a Scotch governess, a Zulu cook, a Hottentot housemaid, and a Kaffir stable boy, while the little girl who waited at table was a Basuto.

Week Without Deaths.

A contemporary states that during the week ending Saturday, August 5, last, not a single death was registered as having occurred in the borough of Ramsgate. This record is a remarkable one, as the population at the time, including visitors, must have exceeded 60,000 persons.

A Happy Village.

The happiest village in "Merrie England" is Twyford, Leicestershire, where a large number of laboring men are the owners of 1,000 yards of land property, which they have acquired by paying merely fourpence a week for ten years.

An Honest Opinion.

Mineral, Idaho, Oct. 16th (Special).—That a sure cure has been discovered for those sciatic pains that make so many lives miserable, is the firm opinion of Mr. D. S. Colson, a well known resident of this place, and he does not hesitate to say that cure is Dodd's Kidney Pills. The reason Mr. Colson is so firm in his opinion is that he had those terrible pains and is cured. Speaking of the matter, he says:

"I am only too happy to say Dodd's Kidney Pills have done me lots of good. I had awful pains in my hip so I could hardly walk. Dodd's Kidney Pills stopped it entirely. I think they are a grand medicine."

All Sciatic and Rheumatic pains are cased by Uric Acid in the blood. Dodd's Kidney Pills make healthy kidneys and healthy kidneys strain all the Uric Acid out of the blood. With the cause removed there can be no Rheumatism or Sciatica.

FROM GIRLHOOD TO WOMANHOOD

Mothers Should Watch the Development of Their Daughters—Interesting Experiences of Misses Borman and Mills.

Every mother possesses information which is of vital interest to her young daughter.

Too often this is never imparted or is withheld until serious harm has resulted to the growing girl through her ignorance of nature's mysterious and wonderful laws and penalties.

Girls' over-sensitiveness and modesty often puzzle their mothers and baffle physicians, as they so often withhold their confidence from their mothers and conceal the symptoms which ought to be told to their physician at this critical period.

When a girl's thoughts become sluggish, with headache, dizziness or a disposition to sleep, pains in back or lower limbs, eyes dim, desire for solitude; when she is a mystery to herself and friends, her mother should come to her aid, and remember that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will at this time prepare the system for the coming change, and start the menstrual period in a young girl's life without pain or irregularities.

Hundreds of letters from young girls and from mothers, expressing their gratitude for what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has accomplished for them, have been received by the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., at Lynn, Mass.

Miss Mills has written the two following letters to Mrs. Pinkham, which will be read with interest:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:— (First Letter.)

"I am but fifteen years of age, am depressed, have dizzy spells, chills, headache and backache, and as I have heard that you can give helpful advice to girls in my condition, I am writing you."—Myrtle Mills, Oquawka, Ill.

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:— (Second Letter.)

"It is with the feeling of utmost gratitude that I write to you to tell you what your valuable medicine has done for me. When I wrote you in regard to my condition I had consulted several doctors, but they failed to understand my case and I did not receive any benefit from their treatment. I followed your advice, and took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and am now healthy and well, and all the distressing symptoms which I had at that time have disappeared."—Myrtle Mills, Oquawka, Ill.

Miss Matilda Borman writes Mrs. Pinkham as follows:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"Before taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound my monthlies were irregular and painful, and I always had such dreadful headaches.

"But since taking the Compound my headaches have entirely left me, my monthlies are regular, and I am getting strong and well. I am telling all my girl friends what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me."—Matilda Borman, Farmington, Iowa.

If you know of any young girl who is sick and needs motherly advice, ask her to address Mrs. Pinkham at Lynn, Mass., and tell her every detail of her symptoms, and to keep nothing back. She will receive advice absolutely free, from a source that has no rival in the experience of woman's ills, and it will, if followed, put her on the right road to a strong, healthy and happy womanhood.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound holds the record for the greatest number of cures of female ills of any medicine that the world has ever known. Why don't you try it?

CONSTIPATION AND STOMACH TROUBLE ABSOLUTELY CURED

"I consider Mull's Grape Tonic the very best medicine I have ever taken. My stomach was in such a bad condition that nothing tasted right and the small amount of food that I was able to eat didn't seem to do any good. I became so nervous that sleep was impossible. My strength gave out and I became exhausted and completely run down. I then commenced to take Mull's Grape Tonic and by the time I had finished two bottles my health returned. I now relish my food and can sleep as well as ever. THIS IS MY VOLUNTARY TESTIMONY."

MRS. D. GIANELLI, 404 S. Joliet St., Joliet, Ill.

Continual constipation will inevitably result seriously for the sufferer. No one can let this affliction go unnoticed without losing his health. It brings on Blood Poison, Skin Disease, Sores, Pimples, Stomach Trouble, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Sudden Bowel Trouble, Diarrhea, Cholera, Etc., Nervousness, Insomnia, and Kindred Diseases.

You have no right to suffer from constipation or any of these diseases. There is no necessity or excuse for it. There is one positive, natural, harmless cure—and only one—for these troubles and we are going to give you enough free to prove it.

Cut out the coupon below and we will give you absolutely free of charge a bottle of the only permanent, natural cure for constipation and all bowel troubles and indigestion and all stomach troubles.

MULL'S GRAPE TONIC cures by strengthening and restoring the tissues and muscles of all the digestive organs, and by putting the whole digestive system in a perfect, strong, healthy condition. It does not shock and weaken the organs as purgatives and physics do and thus aggravate the trouble and make a bad matter worse. Its effect is to build up and restore, and not tear down and destroy. It cures the disease by putting the digestive organs in a condition to overcome it. Such a cure amounts to something—it is perfect and permanent.

You feel better and stronger all the time you use it—not weakened and run down as in the case of drugs and physics. You feel the wonderful and beneficial effects of Mull's Grape Tonic at once. You will know that it will cure you as soon as you begin its use. That is why we let you try it free.

From time immemorial there has been a God-given right vouchsafed to man to be lazy in the spring of the year. Everybody avails him or herself of this right, but here comes the Waverly Republican and kicks on this inherent right and says:

"When a man gets the sit-down disease before he is fifty, it is all up with him. Laziness is fatal. You can cure almost any other kind of vice. A drunkard may brace up, a man may get rid of a hot temper, a wild boy may settle down, but a lazy man is a hopeless proposition. Get some one to give you a swift kick every time you feel yourself gravitating towards the cushion. Nip the thing in the bud. If you are an employer, don't keep a sanitarium for a cure of the malady. Let somebody else do the nursing. Give the lazy man his walking ticket. That will do him more good than all the preaching you can put into his head and there is more money in it for you."

What a pernicious doctrine that is! Restrictive laws advocated as to a man's drink, and his pursuits of happiness, and now this persistent editor wants to deny him the right to be lazy when his bones ache, his head feels like a bass drum, and his system needs toning up by a siesta under an old basswood tree near the place where the perch comes to get a drink. Down with such editors! Our old father-in-law used always to sit down on the edge of a rail or on a sharp rock when he rested in the harvest field for fear he would sit down too long if he selected a comfortable seat. Poor man! he was cut down in his prime, aged 83. How long might he have lived and enjoyed this world had he always carried a cushion with him when he went out to harvest? We don't believe in mortification of the hind leg as an incentive to peripatetic activity after one is fifty. Shoot that editor. —Britt Iowa Tribune.

The Northwest has a tremendous wheat and grain crop and the farmers and railroads are considerably worked up about moving it. Taking the most conservative estimates as a basis, the grain to be moved by the railroads this year from the Northwest is placed at 190,000,000 bushels of wheat and oats and 700,000,000 bushels of corn. If these figures should prove correct, and there is no reason to expect less than the above amount, the roads will have 173,000 car loads of wheat and oats or 4,325 train loads of 40 cars each. Of corn there will be in excess of 700,000 car loads. In addition to this it is estimated that there will be in the neighborhood of 17,000 car loads of flaxseed to be moved. This estimate takes no account of rye, barley and other small grain, of which there will be larger quantities than usual to haul. Lumping all kinds of grain together it is believed that the railroads of the Northwest will be called upon to carry this coming year the enormous total of 1,500,000 carloads of the grain or over 100 train loads of 40 cars each for every day in the year. This takes no account of anything but grain.

Something of the confidence in prices for wool next year is seen in the desire of wool buyers to contract for the clip of 1906. It is said that contracts for next year's delivery have been made for the clips in Utah, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming and Oregon, especially in Utah. One party is reported to have contracted for one million pounds. The prices paid have varied somewhat but in Utah much of the contracting has been done at around 20c per pound. Generally speaking, in the territories the contracting has been done at prices equivalent to about the average of what was paid during last spring, which is pretty good evidence that the wool traders do not expect the price of wool to decline for a long time to come. One authority on wool, who has been in London during much of the year writes that he thinks that wool in that market is going to be higher.

Portsmouth, England, has an ordinance in force which forbids the crowing of the rooster. Many poultry fanciers in England have objected to such a regulation, maintaining that it is impossible to stop a rooster from crowing. A remedy suggested is that the roosts in the poultry house be placed so high that when the cock raises his head to crow he will strike it against the roof overhead. A swinging board hung over his head answers the same purpose. Another remedy specially in vogue in the United States is to cut off the tail feathers of the noisy fowl close up to the body. The bird can then no longer strut around and be proud of his plumage and hence will hang his head in humble fashion.

There are 230 glaciers in the Alps that are said to be over five miles in length.

The average school boy rather envies the man who has no hair to comb.

The St. Louis Woman's Magazine has the following, which is too nearly true to be lost:

"Married life is dull because it is a partnership in which there is no equity. When a woman signs a life contract with a man at the altar she puts more capital into the firm than he does. She gives whatever money she may have; she gives the love of her heart; she gives the work of her hands; she gives all the intelligence she possesses; above all, she gives herself. She takes the same risks the man does; if financial trouble comes, she must endure poverty and privation; if mistakes occur she must suffer for them; in all the labor and losses of the firm, she is an equal partner, but she is not an equal partner in its profits and perquisites. She is a silent partner, with no voice in the management of the firm, yet she must stand for its debts. She gives her earning capacity to it, yet she is expected to be grateful for getting her living out of it. She has no idea of whether she has a right to draw much or little money out of the business, yet she is blamed if she spends too much.

"No such unjust arrangement could continue for a minute between men in business, and it ought not to be countenanced between men and women. The two principal things that make the life of the average couple dull are bickering about money and the lack of some subject of conversation of mutual, absorbing interest. A real partnership, based on justice between husband and wife will supply both of these deficits. All that women hate, and get upon their nerves and makes them seem greedy for money is the feeling that they are being treated unjustly—that they are not getting a fair divide. There is not one woman in ten thousand who, if her husband will candidly explain financial situations to her, (and treat her justly,) will not gladly and cheerfully do her part of the economizing. Women, as a rule, do not know what their husbands can afford, and, having no incentive for economizing through lack of knowledge of the financial condition of the firm, and because they never hear or see any tangible results of their saving, they readily find excuses for any extravagance. You never hear of a woman who is taken into active partnership in the matrimonial firm and who is treated justly, as a partner, complaining because she has to work hard and economize."

It is bad enough every summer but the general opinion seems to be that it was never as bad as this; that is, the difficulty of getting outdoor and indoor workers. Neither was there ever before so much indignation at the people that will not work. A prominent and philanthropic farmer says that he speaks for a great number of country people when he declares that ablebodied men and women who refuse to work in summer will be allowed to starve next winter. We say this continually, but when cold weather comes, with it the purse and the brimming dish for those who have brought themselves to destitution with their eyes open. The fact is that the idle and irresponsible class, both white and colored, rest in the belief that the charity of the public will step in and save them from starvation. If we would unite and make public announcement that no one will be given or loaned money, food, fuel or clothes, who will not accept work this summer, and then make a record of every such case of refusal the result might be to put a good many idlers to work. Could not a register be kept of those who refuse to work, having no visible means of support, every employer taking on himself the duty of reporting the names of those to whom he has applied? This is the remedy of the county gentleman quoted above. He has applied to one hundred women who apparently, are without source of income, yet has not been able to get a cook for his family of two elderly persons in a comfortable home.

Another farmer in the same neighborhood has let his oats and other crops rot on the ground for lack of men. People who have no income must beg or steal if they will not work, and it is evident that there are hundreds of men and women in and around Lexington who will be beggars or thieves before next spring. If employers would organize and keep a register of them which anyone could consult at any time these vagrants would soon learn that their choice lies between starvation, the jail or workhouse, and honest labor.—Lexington Gazette.

To the voters of Boone county:—This is the time to do the right thing. Vote for free pikes because it is time Boone county should make one step towards progress. Toll roads are out of date. Hamilton county, Ohio, has voted free turnpikes; Kenton county is in line, and why not old Boone, one of the best counties in the State? They invite business, and will increase our population and prosperity. There is nothing more inviting to the public than free roads and schools. The consumer has all to pay, so give the huckster, the drummer and the poor young man, who wants to take his girl buggy riding, good, free roads. There is no argument for toll roads, only the faxes, and the people who have the property are the ones to pay it. So vote for free pikes and do the right thing.

The age of the sun has been for many years a matter of controversy between geologists and physicists. The investigators of tidal friction claim that five hundred or one thousand million years have elapsed since the birth of the moon, and other scientists, arguing from purely geological reasons, claim the age of the sun to be between fifty and one thousand million years. On the other hand, it is asserted by physicists that, at the rate at which the sun is emitting energy, it can not have been active for more than twenty million years.

NINE HEROES PERISH.

Crew of a Sinking Schooner Saved Another Vessel.

They Severed the Hawser by Which the Minnedosa Was Lashed To the Melrose and the Former Went Down.

Detroit, Mich., Oct. 23.—Nine heroes went down with the schooner Minnedosa which sank in Lake Huron Thursday. The hurricane sent mountainous waves to batter to pieces the wooden boat where eight men and one woman, the captain's wife, were imprisoned. The vessel creaked and groaned and timbers snapped. The bulwarks went over. The wind hissed through the rigging and sent it piece by piece into the lake. Great seams were opened and water poured into the schooner's hold. Ahead tumbled the steel steamer Westmount, staunch and able. Behind pitched the Melrose, a trailer vessel than the Minnedosa and faring worse. The Minnedosa was going to the bottom. Everyone of the nine human beings aboard her knew it. Why should they take others with them. Perhaps if cast loose the Melrose could save herself.

Capt. Jack Phillips' voice rose in command over the howling storm. One of the crew held a sharp axe. It fell and the blow set the Melrose free. A few moments later the Minnedosa with its nine heroes and a cargo of 75,000 bushels of wheat lurched to the bottom off Harbor Beach, Lake Huron.

For 30 years Capt. Alex Milligan, of St. Catherines, Ont., on the steamer Westmount, and Capt. R. A. Davey, of Kingston, Ont., on the schooner Melrose, have sailed the lakes, but the story they told when their boats were laying at Sarnia Sunday was of a battle with wind and water, the like of which they had never before experienced.

"The Minnedosa went to the bottom," said Capt. Milligan, "without a signal of distress. We did not know how serious was her condition.

Out into the lake the Melrose was beaten. For an hour and a half we tried in vain to pick her up and take her to shelter, but every time we failed. I gave up for a while, trusting she would last until daylight, but at 4 o'clock I was convinced that she had a short time on top of the water unless she was taken in tow. Again I made the attempt. Towards 5 o'clock we were successful. She had drifted 20 miles from shore and after that we gained shelter."

STRENGTHEN THE STOMACH

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills Really Cure Indigestion Instead of Merely Relieving Symptoms.

There are plenty of remedies by which you can relieve for the time heartburn, pain and gas on the stomach and can smother nervous sensations and induce artificial sleep. You can humor your stomach by giving it predigested food. But when you take your next meal all your trouble begins afresh.

There is only one sensible thing to do. Strengthen the stomach and do away with the necessity for drugs and artificial foods. The best remedy ever found for this purpose is the one that was used by E. E. Strong, of Caplerille, Shelby county, Tenn.

"For years," he states, "I suffered greatly from indigestion. I tried many different remedies and some of them would relieve me for a time, but the trouble always came back. About six months ago I had an unusually severe attack, and while I tried everything I had ever heard of, I found that none of the ordinary remedies would reach the difficulty this time.

"One day I read in a Memphis paper how Dr. Williams' Pink Pills had cured a Michigan woman, a sufferer from chronic dyspepsia of a most stubborn type. I then tried the same remedy and it proved just as successful in my case. I took only three boxes, and was cured. I have not had the slightest symptoms of indigestion since."

The tonic treatment has a sound principle as its basis, and abundant success in actual use. Multitudes of cases that had defied all other remedies have been cured by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. The pills actually make new blood and strike at the root of all diseases caused by bad blood. They contain no harmful stimulants or opiates. Every dyspeptic should read, "What to Eat and How to Eat." COLORADO CONCERNS.

Routt county, Colorado, contains within its boundaries 72,770 head of cattle, valued at $817,643. In this respect it leads all the counties in the state.

From 35,000,000 to 50,000,000 more tons of freight will be shipped into Denver this year than last, say the general freight agents, who also add that last year was considered the banner year in the railroad history of the town.

Owners of 2,000,000 acres of dry lands in eastern Colorado and western Colorado have formed the Colorado Association for Scientific Farming, to spread the knowledge of the Campbell system of dry farming to the world and to induce the settlement of the western plains.

Following the success which has attended the feeding of field peas to lambs in the San Luis valley, hundreds of farmers who have made fortunes in the process are now trying the same food on cattle, with equally good success. More than 600,000 lambs are being fattened there this year, and it is believed that in two years more the number of cattle fattened per season will exceed that number.

THE SECRET OF YOUTH.

De Soto looked for the secret of youth in a spring of gushing, lifegiving waters, which he was sure he would find in the New World. Alchemists and sages (thousands of them), have spent their lives in quest for it, but it is only found by those happy people who can digest and assimilate the right food which keeps the physical body perfect that peace and comfort are the sure results.

A remarkable man of 94 says: "For many long years I suffered more or less with chronic costiveness and painful indigestion. This condition made life a great burden to me, as you may well imagine.

"Two years ago I began to use Grape-Nuts as food, and am thankful that I did. It has been a blessing to me in every way. I first noticed that it had restored my digestion. This was a great gain but was nothing to compare in importance with the fact that in a short time my bowels were restored to free and normal action.

"The cure seemed to be complete; for two years I have had none of the old trouble. I use the Grape-Nuts food every morning for breakfast and frequently eat nothing else. The use has made me comfortable and happy, and although I will be 94 years old next fall, I have become strong and supple again, erect in figure and can walk with anybody and enjoy it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason."

SECRETARY BONAPARTE BESIEGED BY LETTERS.

FROM NEY'S DESCENDANTS

A Vigorous Son of Kentucky—Admiral Dewey's Energy—After Century of Delay Erect Memorial to Revolutionary Hero.

WASHINGTON.—Secretary of the Navy Bonaparte is paying the penalty of belonging to a royal family. He is a grand-nephew of Emperor Napoleon and the descendants of the great marshals who served under the latter are now appealing to him for assistance. Judging from the number of applications that he has received since his appointment as secretary of the navy made him known internationally, Mr. Bonaparte has come to the conclusion that all of the great Napoleon's marshals must have died poor. Scarcely a day passes that he does not receive a letter from some one in France stating that the writer has descended from one of Napoleon's generals, and as the emperor's grand-nephew is now a man of wealth and position the writer does not doubt that he will be only too glad to render a little assistance.

The secretary cannot undertake to respond to all these applications, but he has let it be known that his modest fortune would soon disappear if he gave even a trifle to each of the applicants. The majority of appeals for aid come from the descendants of Marshal Ney. The Ney family seems to have been very prolific, as members of it are popping up all over the republic of France. In their letters to the secretary they call attention to the great value of Marshal Ney's services to Napoleon and suggest that the secretary in memory of his distinguished grand-uncle, might feel like discharging part of the latter's debt to Ney by substantial financial remittances to the present members of the Ney family.

One of these letters, is from a Ney who has served in the French army. He has sent the secretary a colored portrait of himself, showing that he is dressed in the brilliant French uniform, with baggy trousers of a bright red hue.

A White-Headed Soldier.

IT IS now Maj. Gen. "Jack Weston." The expected promotion has been made and the white-headed soldier, who will be 60 years of age in November, now goes into the line to do active service. It was at first thought that he would be appointed to the general staff, but there was no place for him there, so he will be assigned to command of a division with headquarters at St. Louis. Secretary Taft is not altogether in favor of the policy of putting men of Weston's age into the line, and, with the kindliest feelings for the veteran, he contested with the president over such an assignment When the promotion was decided upon the secretary said to Weston:

"General, the president has been trying to make you a major general and I have been trying to prevent it. The president has won out, and I guess he is right about it."

"That's all right," responded Gen "Jack." "I understand my age is in the way, but I am a pretty lively colt.' Anyone to look at the active, rosy-cheeked Kentuckian, and who is acquainted with his record for hard work, can easily understand how the president persuaded Secretary Taft to waive the policy of not appointing old men to the line in Weston's case.

Gen. Weston is known as the "Charles O'Malley" of the army, as he fills the bill of Lever's Irish soldier hero in most particulars. He is a jolly, light-hearted, energetic, brave officer, and has years of usefulness before him. Only two years ago the army doctors concluded that he was a very sick man, and they thought they had discovered something wrong with his heart. They put him in the soldiers' home hospital and told him he must not take any violent exercise. Weston did not believe that there was anything the matter with his heart, and one day, when his attendants were at dinner, he jumped up, ran across a meadow and back at full speed and found to his satisfaction that there was not the slightest flutter of his heart.

Not Retired on His Laurels.

ADMIRAL DEWEY is setting an example of activity that could well be followed by younger officers in the navy. He is still the naval hero of the present day, but he does not elect to retire on his laurels and rust out in private life. As president of the general naval board he is on duty every day at the department, and takes the keenest interest in everything pertaining to the improvement of the navy. The admiral is 68 years of age and could have retired four years ago if he had wanted to, but he says there is a lot of work that he can do and he proposes to devote his energies to the good of the navy.

Just now Admiral Dewey has been brought into the limelight by his persistent advocacy of big ships for the navy. He has studied the recent war between Russia and Japan with a view to learning lessons that can be applied to the United States navy, and he maintains that the first lesson of this conflict is the dominance of the big battleship in a naval encounter. He declares that the United States must keep abreast of all the great navies of the world, and as Great Britain has now laid down an 18,000-ton battleship it behooves this country to imitate her example and build a vessel of equal size.

Admiral Dewey believes that the defensive and offensive alliance between Great Britain and Japan makes it necessary for the United States to maintain a navy of the first grade. This alliance gives Great Britain and Japan virtual control of the seacoast from the Mediterranean to the northeasternmost point of the Asiatic coast. The United States must have a navy that will command respect in order to maintain the Philippines and protect her commercial interests in the orient. The admiral's views will be spread before congress at the coming session when the question of a big battleship is discussed.

Gen. Hugh Mercer.

AFTER 129 years this government is about to do proper honor to a distinguished revolutionary hero. A memorial is to be erected to the memory of Gen. Hugh Mercer, who is a close friend of Washington and one of the most gallant officers in the revolutionary war. The continental congress, 129 years ago, passed a resolution for the erection of a monument to this officer, but it is only now that this purpose is to be carried out, provision having been made by the last congress for the erection of a statue of Gen. Mercer at Fredericksburg, Va. A prominent sculptor has been given the contract for the memorial.

Gen. Mercer was a native of Scotland, and in the early days before the revolution, in fact, before the French and Indian war, he came to America and settled at Fredericksburg, where he became known as one of the ablest lawyers in that part of the country. He formed a friendship with George Washington when the latter was an officer in the colonial service, and engaged with him in the ill-fated Braddock expedition of 1755. He was severely wounded at Braddock's fields, near Fort Duquesne, and traveled on foot in that condition to Fort Cumberland, 160 miles east.

On the breaking out of the revolution, he was again associated with Washington, and was conspicuous for his gallantry in many an engagement particularly in the battles of Trenton and Princeton. In the latter engagement he received his death wound. The continental congress, in its enthusiasm over Gen. Mercer's gallantry, upon receiving news of his death in battle, passed a resolution for a memorial, but the necessary funds were not set aside to erect one. That oversight of more than a century ago has been remedied, and now the gallant Scotchman who gave his life for the United States will be honored for all time by a memorial fitting in sentiment and workmanship.

The Little Fighter from Wisconsin.

ONE of the subjects that is interesting United States senators just now is the probable conduct of Gov. La Follette of Wisconsin, who has been elected a senator from that state. There have been all sorts of stories afloat as to the radical course of action he is likely to follow when he enters the senate. The fact that the railway rate question will be a topliner in the senatorial program this winter has led to the supposition that Senator La Follette will jump to the front in a sort of continuous performance on that subject.

One of the old members of the senate, in discussing "Bob" La Follette's probable course, said the other day: "I don't believe that Mr. La Follette will attempt to run the senate, or unduly occupy its time. He served three terms in the house of representatives, and has a very accurate knowledge of what the senate customs are.

"It is very well known that a new member of the senate is expected to keep in the background for the first year or so. I know that that was the way with me, and I had had previous experience in the house of representatives. The senate has a quiet, complacent way of extinguishing gentus that is too persistent and calculated to offend the traditions of the body. A senator who really wants to be useful to his state will wisely "feel" his way for the first year or two. After he has got his bearings and established a footing, if he is a man of ability, there is no place that his genius will count for so much as in the United States senate."

JOSEPH THE DREAMER

OUR BIBLE STORY by the "Highway and Byway" Preacher

(A Vision Between the Lines of God's Inspired Word.)

Scripture Authority. — "And Joseph dreamed a dream, and he told it to his brethren, and they hated him yet the more. And he said unto them, Hear I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed; for, behold, we were binding sheaves in the field, and, lo, my sheaf arose, and also stood upright; and, behold, your sheaves stood round about, and made obeisance to my sheaf. And his brethren said to him, Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams, and for his words. And he dreamed yet another dream, and told it to his brethren, and said, Behold, I have dreamed a dream more; and, behold, the sun and the moon and the 11 stars made obeisance to me. And he told it to his father, and to his brethren; and his father rebuked him, and said unto him, What is this dream that thou hast dreamed? Shall I and thy mother and thy brethren indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee to the earth? And his brethren envied him; but his father observed the saying."—Gen. 37:5-11.

JOSEPH'S loud, cheery halloo brought no response from his brothers, whom he could see working in the distant field further than a scanty look in his direction. There was no answering call, or wave of hand, such as might have been expected, and he felt instinctively that it was only further evidence of the ill-will which his older brothers were coming more and more to show towards him. He often wondered why they should feel so, and had he not been of such an open, frank, cheery disposition, overlooking slights and unkindly words, and trying persistently to meet his brothers on friendly ground, he would long before have given up in despair.

Nothing which they did seemed to ruffle his even temper, and so pure-hearted and noble and generous in thought was he that it never entered his mind to question their motives towards him. He thought no evil concerning them, for his nature so lived in the upper currents of God's love and sunshine that he had no conception of the base and selfish motives which lurked in the shadows and darkness on the lower levels. To be sure, he was keenly sensitive to evil and wrong-doing in others, and was always ready to rebuke it, but never in critical or unkindly spirit or with that offensive I-am-holier-than-thou manner. He delighted in that which was good and right, and it never entered his mind but that others must feel the same as he. When with his brothers and observing their evil ways, as was often the case when they were away with the flocks and yielded to the temptations to unclean living, the result of the influences of the heathen nations among whom they dwelt, he would in his modest, unassuming way point out the wrongdoing, and just as the clear, full rays of the sun reveal without fear or favor the pure lily reaching up towards heaven's blue as well as the loathsome bug crawling in the dirt at its foot, so Joseph, in talking with his father, openly and freely and frankly told all that transpired. It would have been as hard for him to conceal and cover up as to share in the wrongdoing itself, and so not only had he incurred the dislike of his brothers through his innate good qualities, for evil is always condemned and disquieted in the presence of that which is good, but they hated him for bringing the stories of their doings to their father. And so it had come to pass that they could not speak peaceably to him, and as they saw him coming towards them that morning they had no smile or word of greeting for him.

Without apparently noticing their unfriendly looks and surly response to his cheery: "Peace be to thee," the common salutation when persons met, he unslung his skin bottle of goats' milk and placed it on the ground beside the basket of bread, saying as he did so:

"There's a treat for you. Father thought the milk and the fresh-baked bread would taste better than the provisions you brought with you."

Without a "thank you," save from Reuben, the oldest son, who rudely ejaculated: "Well, you do do something useful once in awhile," the brothers seated themselves on the ground and eagerly fell to, devouring the food Joseph had brought with that enthusiasm and relish which comes from a good appetite, stimulated by their vigorous outdoor life.

"Father said I could stay and help you finish with the harvesting," Joseph said, as he took up one of the sickles and set to work on the waving grain before him. After some half dozen sheaves had been thus deftly finished, he paused to lay aside his outer robe, which hampered the full freedom of movement, and as he did so he chanced to glance in the direction of his brothers and noted that they were eying the garment with peculiar interest. Proudly bolding it out, he exclaimed:

"Father made it for me. Is it not pretty?"

There was no response save an ill-natured grunt of apparent disapproval, and Joseph, without noticing it, went on to say:

"He got the different colored cloths from a trader who stopped with us the other day. I wanted him to make it for Baby Benjamin, but he wanted me to have it, for mother had planned such a coat for me before she died, he said. And I am going to take good care of it," he added, as he folded it carefully and laid it on the top of the last sheaf he had bound. Joseph worked with the rest all the remainder of the day, and when at night they all lay down to sleep he was almost too tired to sleep. He had worked hard, hoping [illegible] commendation of his brothers, but there had been nothing but surly words and cold, forbidding looks in response to his cheery sallies and vigorous efforts. And as he lay awake, watching the stars overhead, he felt dejected and troubled. Why should his brothers treat him so? He wondered, as he looked upward, if God knew and cared. And then the thought came to him, as he noticed that each star had its place and flashed forth its light gladly and freely, that it must be so on earth, and that each person had his place to fill and must do his best. The thought comforted him and he fell to studying what plans God had for him in the coming years, for he had reached that period in life when the young life responds eagerly to the hope and aspirations of the future. Thus occupied in mind, he fell asleep, and in his dreams it seemed that the sheaves of the field began marching about and that suddenly all fell prostrate to the ground before one of the sheaves that came and stood at his side and which he recognized as his sheaf, for upon its top rested the beautiful coat of many colors. So vivid was the vision that he awoke with a start and in jumping up his feet caught in his blanket and he fell across his brother Reuben, lying next to him. With a loud exclamation of surprise and anger, which aroused all the rest, the latter leaped to his feet and, seizing Joseph, demanded to know what was the matter. With much confusion and embarrassment Joseph related his dream, and the angry words of scorn which were cast at him as he finished frightened him.

"You blasphemer you," fiercely cried Judah, "shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? Lie down there and let us hear no more of your wild dreams."

But again as he fell into troubled sleep he dreamed yet again and thought that the sun and moon and 11 stars stepped down from the distant heavens and bowed themselves before him. What could it mean? The thought of self was forgotten in the larger thought of God's purposes and plans, and so next morning when his brothers in malicious hatred bickered and abused him because of his dream, and asked with a sneer if he had any more dreams to tell them, he frankly related his second vision.

"It is nothing but the blasphemy of a wicked heart," declared Judah. "Father ought to know this. Such wicked pretensions ought to be punished."

"He shall not lord it over us any longer," fiercely exclaimed Dan, as they started homeward, "nor flaunt the insinuations of his so-called dreams in our faces."

"Yes," broke in Gad, as he thought of his own evil ways, and imputed evil to others, as is the manner of the wicked, "he's not as good as he would like to have others think he is, and he is always spying on us."

In this temper they appeared before their father, whom they found seated before his tent, with Joseph at his feet. The latter's face was flushed and the father was so earnestly talking with him that he did not observe the presence of the brothers, who had come up behind him, until Joseph rose to give them welcome, no sign of resentment appearing in his manner, as he greeted them with: "Peace be to thee."

Utterly ignoring his salutation, but bowing respectfully before their father, who had risen hastily to receive them, they at once broke forth in their complaint against their brother.

"Yea, I know," responded Jacob, after he had listened patiently to their story, "Joseph himself hath told me of his dreams."

"And should we suffer such pretense? Should we allow this mere stripling to exalt himself above his father and brethren?" demanded Judah, who acted as spokesman.

"Nay," responded the father, quickly, "I have but just been rebuking him for the vain imaginations of his heart."

"But, father, I have only told thee and my brothers what has come to me in my dreams," Joseph interposed, earnestly.

"Tush, tush, my son," he replied, sharply. "Shall I and thy mother and thy brethren indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee to the earth?"

"I know not as to that, but I can but tell thee the truth," stoutly maintained the boy, looking frankly into the faces of his father and brothers.

"He ought to be punished for his impudence," muttered one of the boys, and the rest by nod of head and vengeful looks signified how heartily they acquiesced in that view.

"The boy is evidently sincere," quickly responded the father, unwilling to entertain for an instant the thought of inflicting punishment upon the boy he loved so well. "That his dreams are the strange fancies of his young brain I believe, but I do not think he is guilty of false pretensions in this matter. He shall not be punished."

Angry and disappointed, the brothers turned and walked away, muttering as they went, and the father, despite his effort to believe that Joseph's dreams were but the wild vagaries of troubled sleep, pondered the matter in his heart, but found no answer for his questionings.

Was Joseph the dreamer destined by God for some exalted place? Were his dreams a revelation from God?

BOONE CO. RECORDER
Wednesday, - - Oct., 25, 1905.
W. L. RIDDELL, - - Publisher.

For Free Turnpikes.

Editor of the Recorder:

The legal voters of Boone county will be granted the privilege on November the 7th, of deciding by their ballots, whether their county shall purchase its existing turnpikes and make them free to the public, or leave them in the possession of a few individuals who are taxing the balance of our good citizens for using them.

Every legal voter in the county has the right granted him through his state and national constitution to vote upon this question. The man who has but a hundred dollars of taxable property is as capable of possessing as much pride, and feeling as deep an interest in the future welfare and progress of his county as the man who owns his thousand acres. The burden of keeping up these roads will fall no more oppressively upon the large land owner than upon the poor fellow that has but his head to be taxed. The latter class are the ones that are generally called upon to work our public highways.

A small tax would have to be assessed upon the taxable property in the county to purchase these turnpikes. We have, as near as I can figure, about 81 miles of turnpikes in the county and twenty thousand dollars will buy everyone of them. Five cents on the $100 of taxable property for five years will purchase every one of them. The average farmer in our county does not pay tax on more than $6,000. His burden of taxation in the purchase of these turnpikes would be $3 a year for five years. Is there a farmer of this average that does not pay more than $3 toll to our turnpikes in a year?

We have appropriated, for several years, between six and seven thousand dollars for keeping in repair our public highways. If this money had been economically expended, Boone county would be able to boast, today, of her splendid thoroughfares throughout the county. Every farmer in the county would have an inviting and pleasant driveway passing his home.

What is the remedy? I would suggest that our road law should be revised and the magistrates be made to oversee over the roads in his jurisdiction, and when a road needed repairing let him contract with some one who is responsible and interested to do the work. I would suggest further, that the proper authorities in the county should condemn land and take her public highways out of creek beds to high land. I believe that if this change in our road law were made and our turnpikes made free, that an appropriation of 15 cents on the $100 of taxable property would keep all the turnpikes and dirt roads in splendid repair.

In case our turnpikes are made free I would deem it a wise policy on the part of our county to agree to assist any community with $750 a mile for every mile of public road they would macadamize. Of course there would have to be a fixed standard in order to obtain the assistance.

I am going to vote to free our pikes because I believe that the private ownership of public utilities is not defensible. Nor do I believe that any county is justified in granting a franchise to an individual or corporation, permitting them to erect toll gates and tax her citizens for using their public thoroughfares. I do not believe that a state or county has a right to condemn and take property other than for public uses. Hence, a turnpike can be nothing more than a public highway, and a public highway cannot be private property. Turnpike companies do not own the corpus or land upon which their roads are built; but simply have a franchise from the state, enabling them to collect reasonable tolls from all who make use of same. I do not purpose in writing this article to influence a single voter in the county. I simply desire to give expression to views I have entertained upon this subject ever since I have been capable of forming an opinion upon any sub ject.

Boone county is my adopted county, and I am proud of the old Commonwealth. I want to see her enter the front ranks in the procession of progress that is marching through all the counties in our state and through all enterprising states in our Union.

G. C. GRADDY.

The RECORDER has taken no part in the discussion of the free turnpike question that is to be submitted to the voters of Boone county on the 7th day of next month, and it proposes now to only give some data taken from the county records, whereby its readers can do their own figuring as to what it will cost to free the [illegible] now in operation in Boone county, and from what amount of taxable property they have to draw the necessary funds at 25 cents on the $100, as no poll tax can be collected for turnpike purposes.

In round numbers there is $6,600,000 worth of taxable property in Boone county, on which an annual tax of 25 cents on the $100 will produce, annually, $16,250 as a turnpike fund to be used in maintaining the 90 miles of pike now in the county and in constructing new pikes.

If the county votes for free turnpikes at the next election, that vote instructs the fiscal court to purchase the 83 miles of toll-paying pikes in the county, five of which, only, pay tax on the following valuation, exclusive of toll houses and other property, as shown by the assessor's book:

Burlington & Florence	$5,000
Bullittsville & Dry Creek	7,000
Union & Beaver	1,500
Union & Florence	4,000
Beaver & Richwood	3,000
Total	$20,500

That leaves about 50 miles of toll-paying roads in the county unaccounted for, of which 11 miles is the Covington & Lexington pike, which is a very important thoroughfare to a very large per cent of the population of this county. By placing the insanely low valuation of $100 per mile on these 50 miles of pike, the total is brought up to $25,500, which, by the time allowance is made for leakage, will require two years' assessment to meet.

If the taxable value of the five roads above specified is $25,500, it is no difficult matter to approximate what their selling value will be when they are put upon a market where there is bnt one purchaser and that buyer is compelled to buy.

It is true that the court of appeals has laid down a basis for arriving at the value of the pikes in a county when a county has voted to buy them, and that basis is so eminently satisfactory to the owners of several of the pikes in the county, that they are utterly indifferent as to the result of the vote on the 7th of November.

In some quarters it has been argued that the man who pays no property tax ought not to take any part in the vote on the free turnpike proposition. The law in Kentucky recognizes no property qualification for voters on any proposition—in fact at the ballot box and at the grave are the only places in this world where the poor man is on a leval with his rich neighbor, and he should not be begrudged these small satisfactions.

Again, there have been quite a number of suggestions as to what ought, and what ought not, to be done if free turnpikes carry. Suggestions cut no ice whatever in this matter. The law provides the course to pursue to make free the pikes in a county, and suggestions can neither add to nor take from that law. If suggestions went for law chaos would be the result.

In the land of the free and the home of the brave, the interest of the individual must yield to the interest of the public, and if those in Boone county, who desire free turnpikes, are in the majority, tbey are entitled to them, and no amount of ridicule, sarcasm nor pet names bestowed upon them will change the fundamental principle in this government—"the majority rules."

Governor Hanley, of Indiana, sizes up the situation thusly: "This nation has gone money mad. For ten years this land has enjoyed material wealth and prosperity such as the world has never before seen, and during that time this madness has come upon us in full force. We have forgotten the commandment, 'Thou Shalt Not Steal,' and we are taking the position that it does not matter how money is obtained so long as it is got. We cannot continue in this road, indefinitely and secure the continuance of free institutions. The dangers of peace will destroy this country at the present rate, just as certainly as a disastrous war."

The Outlook claims that there are over two hundred persons in Bath county, who are over ninety years old. That claim can not be truthfully made for Breathitt.

A clean, well-drained barnyard is an essential factor in the production of sanitary milk, for where cows are obliged to wade in mire and filth it is easy to foretell what the quality of the milk will be. In order to secure a good barnyard the slope should be away from the stable, or at least not toward the stable; and it should be covered with gravel or cinder. If the manure is not taken directly from the stables to the fields, it should be placed where the cows cannot have access to it.

An Indiana Judge released some gamblers, brought before him recently, because the indictment gave the wrong number to the room in which they were found. One room opened into another, and by mistake the unoccupied room was named as the one in which the gamblers were arrested. The judge decided that he would not punish the men because they were not violating the law in the particular room named in the indictment. There was no doubt about the gambling, nor that the men brought before His Honor were the ones who were guilty of the crime. The accidental error of the officers in making out the writ was as good as an alibi in getting the prisoners out of trouble. The judge seemed to be looking for a loop-hole through which the culprits might be let out, rather than means to put law breakers behind the bars, and thus produce that wholesome respect for law that is so needful for the peace and welfare of the community.

The Kentucky State Grange is in session in Covington.

Enough timber was shipped from Ashland last year to make a train more than eighty miles in length. If this lumber had been sawed into fence boards and posts, allowing a post every ten feet and three boards to a post, a fence could have been constructed around the world and enough would be left over to fence in our dear Kentucky. Or if it had been made into a platform, it would have provided room for a dancing party consisting of the entire population of Kentucky and Tennessee, all dancing at once. For a country supposed to produce nothing but coon skins and ginseng, this seems pretty plain figuring.

If Louisville is half so bad a city as one of its papers and a candidate who is trying to break into office represent it, it is very strange that any person who has any self regard will live there or visit the city for any purpose whatever. According to the public utterances of the candidate referred to and those of the paper that is backing him, Louisville is litterally a cest pool of corruption, a harbor for thieves, thugs and gamblers. If the picture they draw of Louisville is true, it ought to be walled in and not less than seven out of ten of its citizens presented with a suit of stripes, and if the candidate who is giving his city such a severe roasting is half as good a man as he ought to be, it is very strange that he should remain in a harbor of thieves, thugs, gamblers, murderers, and purgerers long enough to become eligible to office. Good men are not found in such places.

The State Supreme Court issued a writ of alternative mandamus against the Board of Education of Kansas City, Kansas, returnable November 7, requiring it to show cause why colored pupils are now allowed to attend school at the same houses and in the same building as the white pupils. This action was taken in answer to the petition of a colored pupil, who declares that she and other pupils of her race are required to attend school in the afternoon while the white pupils have the forenoon. The last session of the Legislature passed a bill providing for separate high school buildings. The building for the colored children is now in course of construction, and the school board has set apart half of each day at the white school for the use of the negroes.

To The Tax-payers of Boone County:—As I hear the complaint going out every day that the people generally do not understand the principles involved in the coming election on the free turnpike proposition I will undertake to explain as best I can in a limited space the Free Turnp[illegible] and what it means to the taxpayers of this county. "If it appear (at the coming election) that a majority of all the votes cast for and against said proposition (of free turnpikes) are in favor of said proposition, then the fiscal court may acquire, by gift, lease, purchase or contract, any or all the turnpike roads, or parts of such as lie within the county, on the best terms consistent with public interests, in the discretion of said court, and may provide for the construction of new turnpike or gravel roads when the public good demands it. Said fiscal court may levy a tax from year to year on all the estate of every kind assessed for state and county purposes, not to exceed in any year twenty-five cents on the one hundred dollars of taxable property, for the purpose of paying for and maintaining such roads as may be acquired under this act and keeping them in repairs." This confers upon the fiscal court the right to acquire and construct turnpikes throughout the county with very little means however for acquiring or constructing the pikes. The pikes that have been constructed and are now in use can only be made free by purchasing them from the owners and paying for them. It is not necessary that the county pay what the owners may see fit to ask. If the fiscal court thinks the price asked to be unreasonable, then, it is the duty of the fiscal court to institute proceedings in the county court in the nature of a condemnation proceeding which shall be tried and the value fixed as allowed by law in condemnation for railroad purposes. But in all events the owners of the roads must be paid a fair compensation for the property. The process of acquiring and constructing free turnpikes throughout the county by the fiscal court must necessarily be very slow and prolonged with the limited amount of means placed at their command each year derived from the taxes received from the levy of twenty five cents on each one hundred dollars taxable property, as you must bear in mind that the pikes acquired must be repaired and maintained. For the purpose of meeting this emergancy and securing to the fiscal court the necessary means for carrying out this policy and improvement the legislature authorizes the fiscal court to issue county bonds for an amount to be fixed by the fiscal court not exceeding in amount, however, the limitation placed on same by the constitution. Said bonds to be issued in denominations of not less than one hundred dollars nor greater than one thousand dollars and shall be made payable in not less than two years nor more than thirty years from the date of the bonds and shall not bear interest at a rate greater than six per cent. But before said bonds shall be issued, the question shall be submitted to the legal voters at a general election held in the county. Before said question shall be submitted, a petition signed by legal voters, to the number of at least fifteen per cent. of the votes cast at the last general election held in the county, shall have been filed in the county court asking a submission of the question whether such bonds shall be issued.

At this election it requires that at least two-thirds of all the votes cast shall be in favor of the bond issue, to authorize said issue, and, "that for the purpose of raising the money to pay the interest on the aforesaid bonds, and to finally redeem and pay off same, the said court may annually levy an advalorem tax on all the taxable property of the county, sufficient for the purpose of paying said interest on said bonds and of creating a sinking fund for the ultimate redemption of such bonds when due; and said sinking fund shall be held and kept sacredly for that purpose and no other, but such tax shall not exceed fifty cents on each $100 worth of said property. Hoping that I have made myself clear on all the propositions involved, I beg to remain, Respectfully Yours.

RAILROADS AND SENATE.

Republican Leaders Have Questionable Power to Extort Campaign Funds.

The railroad attorneys and managers have changed front again. When the senate committee on interstate commerce adjourned last summer it was announced that all the republican members of the committee were agreed on the details of the report they would make which would be opposed to rate legislation. In the meantime Senator Elkins, Senator Foraker and others have been trying to convince President Roosevelt that his recommendation to the last congress to give the interstate commerce commission power to fix a reasonable rate in place of a rate decided as unreasonable, is impracticable—that is, with such a law, the power of the republican leaders to extort campaign funds from the railroads would be diminished, or exhausted.

It is now stated that another long series of hearings by the senate interstate commerce committee is probable, which would indicate that the railroad lobby have counted the noses of the members of the house of representatives and the find a majority will vote to pass a bill such as the president will recommend, as they did at the last session. To gain time in the senate will, therefore, be everything for the railroads, as by putting off action there, other legislation can be forced to the front that will lend to prolonged debate, thus making it possible to again shelve the railroad rate bill.

The railroad managers are certainly asking their friends in the senate to take desperate chances politically by thus procrastinating and opposing what the great majority of the people are demanding, and some of them will likely fall by the wayside. The railroads and corporations have been the secret influence that prevented a constitutional amendment for electing senators by direct vote. Legislatures can be influenced and corrupted to vote for railroad attorneys, or friends of trusts and corporations, to represent their states. The people are more difficult to manage. Keep your eye therefore on your senators and if they prove fals to your interests, elect members of the legislature who are pledged to vot against such traitors.

HOLE FOR REPUBLICANS.

Political Graves for the Party Dug by Senator Foraker's Spade.

Two spasms of political virtue have seized the Ohio State Journal—the republican organ of Ohio. May he it is not virute that has influenced the Journal, but merely the reading and interpretation of the handwriting on the wall, and the attempt to evade the inevitable This republican organ only a week or two ago boldly attacked Senator Dick for declaring the tariff was the paramount issue of the Ohio campaign. Now the Journal editorially attacks Senator Foraker for the declaration in his Bellefontaine speech against President Roosevelt's railroad rate legislation program. "There are two sides to that question," says the Journal, "and we feel safe in saying that five-sixths of the republicans of Ohio are on the other side." The Journal then invites Senator Foraker to the difficult task of winning the voters to the railroad side of the question.

The republican voters of Ohio who stand with President Roosevelt are forced logically to vote the democratic ticket, for a victory of the republicans would be a defeat for President Roosevelt. Senator Foraker took pains to explain that the republican platform did not indorse the president's program for railroad rate legislation because it was a democratic measure, having been brought forward years ago and adopted in democratic platforms.

Senator Foraker has put his party in a political hole and it is not unlikely he may thus find his political grave already dug by his own efforts.

THE DRIFT OF POLITICS.

—Why not have Mr. Cortelyou testify before the insurance investigation committee?—Boston Globe.

—Don't forget, Secretary Wilson, that we are eagerly waiting for you to make good on that prediction that the cost of living was going to be lower.—Indianapolis News (Ind.).

—Secretary Shaw's decision to retire from the cabinet and become a formal candidate for the republican presidential nomination is an event of much importance—to Mr. Shaw.—Kansas City Star.

—It is painful to note that popular prejudice is so bitter that some people actually think indicted members of the beef trust should attend their own trials. Well may we pause, and ask whither we are drifting.—Kansas City Star.

—Now it is coming out that the real science in the making of freight rates, which it would be next to sacrilege for the government to interfere with, consists in letting the trusts order what rates they want and filling the order sometimes at a loss.—Pittsburg Chronicle.

—"Deficits are not likely if we make our expenditures comes within our income," says Mr. Hull. Secretary Shaw should have had that statement copyrighted when he first made it.—Washington Post.

—Secretary Shaw's declaration that "twentieth century conditions in the United States are not as well calculated to develop strong characters, great minds and colossal personalities," etc., naturally reminds one that, fortunately, the formative period of the secretary's life took place before things got into such unsatisfactory shape.—Indianapolis News (Ind.).

METHODS OF REPUBLICANS

Secretary Shaw a Fiscal Charlatan Who Is Doing Funny Stunts.

The address of Secretary Shaw before the Ohio Bankers' association at Cleveland contained some [illegible] statements, if he is correctly reported by the Associated Press. After stating that our monetary system is not perfect, because it is non-elastic, Mr. Shaw said "there will be no further currency legislation until we have experienced a panic," and "we came nearer such a panic September 30, 1902, than most people appreciate. We do not need and must not have inflation. The average amount of money is, in my judgment, abundant. The difficulty lies in the fact that the volume remains stationary." Oh! we must not have inflation. Why, Secretary Shaw must know that inflation is going on every hour and minute. The treasury circulation statement for August 1, 1905, shows an inflation of the total money in circulation of $58,312,789 from the same date in 1904, of which $54,074,011 was an inflation of national bank notes alone. This inflation was intensified during July of this year, which is included in the total already given, for during that month the increase in the circulation of national bank notes was $8,251,589, or at the rate of over $100,000,000 a year.

How is that for inflation? Yet Secretary Shaw says: "The difficulty lies in the fact that the volume of money remains stationary." The secretary of the treasury also seems to have overlooked the enormous gold inflation that is in progress of over $70,000,000 per annum and steadily increasing.

On top of all this inflation the secretary of the treasury would give the national Banks the right to issue an amount of currency equal to 50 per cent. of their bonds deposited in the treasury by paying six per cent., upon which the treasury has already issued to the banks full face value. That, according to Shaw, is not inflation, it is merely to tide Wall street over its annual debauch of dear money, "to move the crops"—that is to move the crop of undigested securities.

This high finance is a wonderful institution in green republican hands. They don't want inflation, but they inflate the bladder almost to the bursting point and at the same time declare the volume of money is stationary.

President Roosevelt should call down this fiscal charlatan, or he will make the financial end of the administration a laughing stock to the world, let alone to our own people.

With the tariff trusts holding up prices and inflation helping to inflate the cost of living, those republican policies are making the lot of those with limited incomes a hard one to bear.

RESTITUTION BELATED.

Savings Provided for Widows and Orphans Absorbed by Republicans.

Far greater disclosures of the republican campaign fund graft from the insurance companies are expected by Mr. Hughes, the attorney in charge of the New York investigation. The claim is made that the life insurance companies contributed an aggregate of $1,000,000 in the campaigns of 1896, 1900 and 1904. Of all the republican scandals exposed during the past few years, this campaign fund scandal is the most disgraceful and disastrous to the republican party. It was bad enough to receive donations from the trusts and corporations that were expecting to receive favors, or to do business with the government, but to use the savings, especially provided for the widow and orphan, to debauch the voters of the close states, is beyound measure atrocious.

It is said that President Roosevelt feels the disgrace of this exposure keenly and is planning that restitution be made by having Mr. Cortelyou, the chairman of the republican national committee, return the amount received in 1904. But that would only be a partial restitution, for there would still remain the greater amount received in 1896 and 1900.

The policy holders of these insurance companies have a duty to perform for their families, and that is to insist on the retirement of the management that has plundered their savings and the voters have their duty to perform, which is, "to turn the rascals out" who secured the money.

It is impossible now for the republican party to make restitution to the democrats for their purchase of the election in 1896 and 1900, if not in 1904, with the money furnished by the corporations, trusts and insurance companies, but the voters of the United States can even matters up by refusing to condone the iniquity, by defeating the party that accomplished it.

—Some of the Chicago packers, it is said, will turn state's evidence. Perhaps we will then learn what is put in the potted ham.—Detroit Free Press.

—Did the republican party in New York corrupt the life insurance companies, or did the life insurance companies corrupt the republican party?—Philadelphia Record.

—There are plenty of grounds for a clash before the winter is over. If the president forgets to speak softly and swings his big stick over the senate he may not go so far as he hopes.—N. Y. World.

—The republican party, as a whole, has long contended that the tariff should not be touched except by its friends. During the coming session these friends will be more numerous than ever before; but that, of course, will make not the slightest difference from their standpoint. They will never revise the tariff if they can avoid it.—Houston Post.

THE CHANGE OF LIFE

INTELLIGENT WOMEN PREPARE

Dangers and Pain of This Critical Period Avoided by the Use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Mrs. A. E. G. Hyland

How many women realize that the most critical period in a woman's existence is the change of life, and that the anxiety felt by women at this time draws near is not without reason?

If her system is in a deranged condition, or she is predisposed to apoplexy or congestion of any organ, it is at this time likely to become active and, with a host of nervous irritations, make life a burden.

At this time, also, cancers and tumors are more liable to begin their destructive work. Such warning symptoms as a sense of suffocation, hot flashes, dizziness, headache, dread of impending evil, sounds in the ears, timidity, palpitation of the heart, sparks before the eyes, irregularities, constipation, variable appetite, weakness and inquietude are promptly heeded by intelligent women who are approaching the period of life when woman's great change may be expected.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the world's greatest remedy for women at this trying period, and may be relied upon to overcome all distressing symptoms and carry them safely through to a healthy and happy old age.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound invigorates and strengthens the female organism, and builds up the weakened nervous system as no other medicine can.

Mrs A. E. G. Hyland, of Chestertown, Md., in a letter to Mrs. Pinkham, says:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I had been suffering with falling of the womb for years and was passing through the change of life. My womb was badly swollen. I had a good deal of soreness, dizzy spells, headaches, and was very nervous. I wrote you for advice and commenced treatment with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound as you directed, and I am happy to say that all those distressing symptoms left me, and I have passed safely through the change of life a well woman."

For special advice regarding this important period women are invited to write to Mrs. Pinkham for advice. It is free and always helpful.

His One Complaint.

"Do they treat you well here?" asked the good woman who was trying to do a little missionary work behind the bars.

"Fairly well, ma'am," answered the burglar, who was enjoying a three years' vacation. "I have only one fault to find with the treatment they hand out."

"What is that?" queried the lady visitor.

"They refuse to let me carry a night key!" replied the prisoner.—Chicago Daily News.

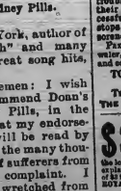
MANY KNOW THIS—DO YOU?

The following very interesting conversation between Mr. White, banker, and Mr. Walter Wellman, retired, two prominent citizens of the town, was recently overheard:

"I never buy patent medicine," said Mr. White. "When I feel the need of medical assistance I call our physician. I don't believe in taking a lot of stuff that I know nothing about. I know, however, that a great many do use it, and apparently with good results, but I am for getting a doctor every time."

"Your circumstances render this possible," replied Mr. Wellman, "but the majority of people must consider the expense. My experience is that some patent medicines frequently cure when the doctor's skill is baffled. Take, for instance, an affliction; say like constipation and stomach trouble. Did you ever hear of your family physician curing a case like that? If constipated, he gives you a physic; but a physic cannot cure constipation, and he will tell you so. It is a temporary relief and before long you need more physic or pills. The doctor charges you $2 every time you call on him and you have to pay 50c to 75c to have his prescription filled. Pretty soon you have the 'Pill' or 'Physic' habit and your doctor has a steady customer. You cannot read the doctor's prescriptions. You know no more about what he gives you than you do about the ingredients of a patent medicine. No reliable company will put a lot of money into a patent medicine unless they are convinced that it will do all that is claimed, for it. Usually it is the prescription of some specialist who has devoted his life to the study of a certain disease and has mastered it.

I mention constipation and stomach trouble because I suffered from that affliction for years. It is the beginning of nearly all disease. Once it gets a grip on you, it is serious, stubborn and hard to overcome. I never knew a case that was cured by an ordinary practicing physician; but I do know of a number of bad cases that were permanently cured by a remedy called Mull's Grape Tonic. I have used it in my family with satisfactory results. It cured me, and I know a great many more persons it has cured. It costs 50 cents for a small or $1.00 for a large bottle. I don't know exactly all that is in it, but I do know it cures constipation and stomach trouble, and that is more than my family doctor could do for me.



I was first attracted to the remedy by the company's offer to give the first bottle free to any one who would write to them giving their druggist's name. I am thankful for the benefit it has given and advise every sufferer from constipation to write to the Mull's Grape Tonic Co., 147 4th Ave., Rock Island, Ill., giving them their druggist's address, so that they can procure a bottle free of expense."

A man is more often known by the company he keeps than by the taxes he pays.

A HANDY BAG HOLDER.

Farmer Tells How He Made One Which Did Better Service Than Many Others.

A subscriber in Stephenson county, Illinois, writes to the Prairie Farmer, saying: "I saw in your paper lately an illustration of a bag-holder which I think I can beat. I make a frame at the bottom of two-inch strip, 6x8 inches square, with a solid wood back. For my hopper I used sheet iron of an old hinder, cutting it to slant out at the top on three sides so that it will be easy to shovel into. I then fastened one hook on each corner at the bottom to hang the bag on. A two-inch strip three feet long was then bolted on to the flat side of the hopper, and in this a number of holes were bored. This finished my bagholder, and all I have to do is to hang it on a spike, using the different holes in the strip for this purpose, according to the size of the bag. The illustration shows the plan."

This is another of those little devices that is useful to the farmer. There are comparatively few things that are more useful than a good bag holder. Ordinarily two men are required to do the work that one man can do if he has a bag holder that is practical. It appears as though our Stephenson county (Ill.) subscriber has a plan that will answer every purpose. Some will object to it on account of the hooks, and the liability of tearing the bag, but we venture even though there is some injury, that the damage will not be so great but what the top of the bag will last as long as will the bottom where it comes in contact with the floor.

FERTILIZING ORCHARDS.

W. F. Massey Tells How This Work Can Best Be Done—Fruit Trees Need Enriching.

Farmers as a rule realize the importance of fertilizers on their annual crops, but when it comes to the orchard they imagine that an apple or a peach tree or other fruit tree can get all it needs from the natural soil. And not only do this, but the orchard is often expected to furnish hay or pasture for stock. The result of such treatment is seen all over the country in decrepit trees and poor crops of fruit, and the growers say that the climate has changed, and they can no longer grow fruit as they formerly did, when in fact soil exhaustion is at the root of the whole trouble. When one considers the great amount of plant food that has been taken from the soil to build up a great apple tree, and that a crop of apples takes from the soil mineral matters to thrice the extent that a crop of wheat of 25 bushels per acre will take, the reason for the failure of the fruit becomes apparent. In the early growth of an orchard we want the trees to develop fast, and hence we fertilize the soil with a complete fertilizer and grow some truck crops in it that need such feeding. But after the tree has gotten into a bearing condition we can put the land in grass and cut it several times during the season, and let the cut grass rot on the land, and can thus supply all the nitrogen needed, especially if clover is grown. Plenty of white clover among the grass, well supplied with acid phosphate, and potash mixed five parts of the first to one of the last, will supply in 400 pounds per acre what the fruit needs for its perfection. Try this and see if the fruit does not respond.

SUGGESTIVE POINTERS.

Snow makes a good covering for the wheat fields, but a poor one for harvest implements.

Beware of bran which is adulterated with rice hulls. This mixture disagrees with many animals.

Now be careful. Look ahead. Don't swamp prices by dumping on the market, all at once, too much of this big harvest.

Is the grass on your lawn thin and of poor quality? Scatter some fresh seed and a good dressing of wood ashes over it.

There are some things it isn't really worth while to try. For instance, it is not worth while trying to raise hornets for profit.

Husking corn after the earth begins to freeze and thaw is one of the preventable things that makes the boy want to leave the farm.—Farm Journal.

Cheating the Calves.

There never was a man who was smart enough to cheat his calves and young stock. He may think he is doing it when he scrimps them on their rations, but he will find out when it comes to figuring up in the fall that he is the one who has lost money.

Use of Millet Seed.

Millet seed is one of the finest foods for chickens, as well as other fowls. Scattered among dry leaves it will make a drove of chickens busy and happy for hours.

THE BEE THIS WINTER.

Things to Do in Preparing the Hive and Its Inmates for the Cold Weather.

Feeding should be done early.

Whether the bees are to be wintered in the cellar or on the summer stands, the first and most important matter to be looked after is the supply of stores.

Bees will not go on and rear a lot of young if the food supply is short; so in order that a colony may go into winter quarters strong in young bees, feeding must be done early enough for brood to be reared and matured in vigor before the advent of cold weather. Then, as the nights begin to be chilly and had weather occasionally prevails, the bees become quiet, glide into inaction, and compose themselves for their long sleep.

If bees are to winter in the best condition, they must have sealed honey, or something that will take the place of it, immediately above the cluster and in direct contact with it, as long as the cold weather lasts.

If the honey is well ripened before cold weather sets in, it will keep well; if thin, it may candy.

With a good strong colony, well wintered, the honey should be as good in spring as it was the previous fall, and in some cases better.

Give intelligent care as to winter quarters.

I use a woolen blanket or carpet cover, and on top of it porous and absorbent material—sawdust, chaff, cut straw or forest leaves. The woolen material next the bees conveys the moisture to the other side of the piece of blanket or carpet, where contact with the absorbent material causes it to pass upward, so rendering it harmless to the bees.

Bees exhale vapor, and when this vapor strikes the cold walls of the hive it sometimes congeals into frost there, melting into water, and running out of the hive as soon as the weather is warm enough. Sometimes it merely condenses into water and runs out of the hive as soon as enough is collected.

In packing hives for outdoor wintering, any good dry, loose material may be used, such as wheat chaff, forest leaves, planer shavings or excelsior. The best packing material is that which is loose enough to allow air to penetrate it and carry off the moisture of the bees. Put over this a good tight cover to keep the hive perfectly dry.

According to the opinion of the Farm Journal foul brood is a highly contagious disease. The first symptoms noticeable in a hive are lack of energy among the bees, dead larvae of a dark brown color in the cells, and sunken cappings, some of which are perforated. Upon opening some of the sunken cells, a ropy, putrid mass is found; when lifted with a toothpick it appears like soft dough. When present, great caution is necessary, or it may spread through the whole apiary. If but a few hives are found to contain the disease, they should be burned at once—at night, so that no bees escape and flee to other hives.

If the colonies are but slightly infected, remove all of the comb and confine the bees in an empty box, obliging them to fast for a day or two. After which they may be released, giving them a hive with starters only, and feeding them liberally.

The hives may be disinfected by washing in carbolic acid water. A second removal of the bees may be necessary in some cases.

The great risk of spreading the disease, as well as the time and expense which a cure by drugs or by fasting involves, makes immediate destruction the cheapest cure in the end.

A STOCK-MOVING CRATE.

Convenient Article to Have When Moving Sheep, Calves, Pigs and Other Small Stock.

Instead of wearing yourself out and losing your temper in chasing sheep, calves, pigs, etc., in moving them from pen to pen, you will find it better to use such a crate as is shown in the cut, says Robert Worden, of Iowa, in the Epitomist. This crate is of the knock-down order, being hinged at both ends so that the animals may be driven in at one end and out at the other. Handles may be slipped into the iron loops or brackets placed at suitable height on crate for carrying same while animal is moved along. This arrangement is especially valuable in handling calves or hogs, which usually can be neither led, driven or coaxed along. Make the crate light, but strong. Spruce is the best wood for such purposes, being light but exceedingly tough.

Ducks vs. Chickens.

One great advantage in raising ducks over chickens is that hawks will not touch them. They are, as a rule, hardier than chicks. They are ready for market at ten weeks of age, are confined by a very low fence and are not troubled by lice. A two-foot fence is high enough to keep full grown ducks within bounds, in fact, I seldom use anything higher than one and one-half feet. One thing absolutely necessary is a large room in which to kill and dress the birds and to store grain.—Farm and Home.

New Use for Flypaper.

Iris is the poetic name of a fluffy Angora cat which has a bad habit of running away, relates the New York Herald. Little Betty, who has a proprietary interest in the animal, greeted her mother the other day with startling news. "Irith tried to run away," she said, "and the watch had and wouldn't mind, and I thicked Irith to the flypaper tho the couldn't get away."

Canada's Wireless Stations.

Canada now possesses 12 wireless telegraph stations on the river and Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Atlantic coast. Of the 12 stations, which are under the directions of the department of marine and fisheries, nine are high-power and three low-power. The former can communicate with vessels up to a distance of 250 miles, while the radius of the latter is about 130 miles.

HIGH CLASS DRUGGISTS AND — OTHERS.

The better class of druggists, everywhere, are men of scientific attainments and high integrity, who devote their lives to the welfare of their fellow men in supplying the best of remedies and purest medicinal agents of known value, in accordance with physicians' prescriptions and scientific formula. Druggists of the better class manufacture many excellent remedies, but always under original or officinal names and they never sell false brands, or imitation medicines. They are the men to deal with when in need of anything in their line, which usually includes all standard remedies and corresponding adjuncts of a first-class pharmacy and the finest and best of toilet articles and preparations and many useful accessories and remedial appliances. The earning of a fair living, with the satisfaction which arises from a knowledge of the benefits conferred upon their patrons and assistance to the medical profession, is usually their greatest reward for long years of study and many hours of daily toil. They all know that Syrup of Figs is an excellent laxative remedy and that it gives universal satisfaction, and therefore they are selling many millions of bottles annually to the well informed purchasers of the choicest remedies, and they always take pleasure in handing out the genuine article bearing the full name of the Company—California Fig Syrup Co.—printed on the front of every package. They know that in cases of colds and headaches attended by biliousness and constipation and of weakness or torpidity of the liver and bowels, arising from irregular habits, indigestion, or over-eating, that there is no other remedy so pleasant, prompt and beneficial in its effects as Syrup of Figs, and they are glad to sell it because it gives universal satisfaction.

Owing to the excellence of Syrup of Figs, the universal satisfaction which it gives and the immense demand for it, imitations have been made, tried and condemned, but there are individual druggists to be found, here and there, who do not maintain the dignity and principles of the profession and whose greed gets the better of their judgment, and who do not hesitate to recommend and try to sell the imitations in order to make a larger profit. Such preparations sometimes have the name—"Syrup of Figs"—or "Fig Syrup" and of some piratical concern, or fictitious fig syrup company, printed on the package, but they never have the full name of the Company—California Fig Syrup Co.—printed on the front of the package. The imitations should be rejected because they are injurious to the system. In order to sell the imitations they find it necessary to resort to misrepresentation or deception, and whenever a dealer passes off on a customer a preparation under the name of "Syrup of Figs" or "Fig Syrup," which does not bear the full name of the California Fig Syrup Co. printed on the front of the package, he is attempting to deceive and mislead the patron who has been so unfortunate as to enter his establishment, whether it be large or small, for if the dealer resorts to misrepresentation and and deception in one case he will do so with other medicinal agents, and in the filling of physicians' prescriptions, and should be avoided by every one who values health and happiness. Knowing that the great majority of druggists are reliable, we supply the immense demand for our excellent remedy entirely through the druggists, of whom it may be purchased everywhere, in original packages only, at the regular price of fifty cents per bottle, but as exceptions exist it is necessary to inform the public of the facts, in order that all may decline or return any imitation which may be sold to them. If it does not bear the full name of the Company—California Fig Syrup Co.—printed on the front of every package, do not hesitate to return the article and to demand the return of your money, and in future go to one of the better class of druggists who will sell you what you wish and the best of everything in his line at reasonable prices.

Good News for All.

Bradford, Tenn., Oct. 23rd (Special).—Scientific research shows Kidney Trouble to be the father of so many diseases that news of a discovery of a sure cure for it cannot fail to be welcomed all over the country. And according to Mr. J. A. Davis, of this place, just such a cure is found in Dodd's Kidney Pills. Mr. Davis says:

"Dodd's Kidney Pills are all that is claimed them. They have done me more good than anything I have ever taken. I had Kidney Trouble very bad and after taking a few boxes of Dodd's Kidney Pills I am completely cured. I cannot praise them too much."

Kidney Complaint develops into Bright's Disease, Dropsy, Diabetes, Rheumatism and other painful and fatal diseases. The safeguard is to cure your kidneys with Dodd's Kidney Pills when they show the first symptom of disease.

RESTORED HIS HAIR.

Scalp Humor Cured by Cuticura Soap and Ointment After All Else Had Failed.

"I was troubled with a severe scalp humor and loss of hair that gave me a great deal of annoyance and inconvenience. After unsuccessful efforts with many remedies and so-called hair tonics, a friend induced me to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment. The humor was cured in a short time, my hair was restored as healthy as ever, and I can gladly say I have since been entirely free from any further annoyance. I shall always use Cuticura Soap, and I keep the Ointment on hand to use as a dressing for the hair and scalp. (Signed) Fred'k Busche, 213 East 57th St., New York City."

FREE TURNPIKES.

KINGSVILLE, KY., Oct. 21, 1905.

To the Editor of the Recorder:

I read in the RECORDER that the free turnpike question is being agitated in Boone county, and some of the writers are a little off as to the burden of tax it will impose on the tax-payers of Boone. While it will raise the tax it will put the pikes in better condition than under toll-system, the purchasing of the pikes is an important factor. A note that never gets any interest on and cannot get the principal, is worthless. So with the pikes. There are 165 miles of pikes in Lincoln county, and cost the county between $70,000 and $80,000 to free them or purchase them. A tax of 25 cents on the $100 was levied for road purpose—16 cents to the pikes, bridges and ditching—the other to dirt roads and sinking fund. Eight years ago they were made free. Today the debt is paid and the pikes are in better condition than they were when you had to stop every three or four miles and pay toll. Now you can pay it to the sheriff. Although some of the taxpayers' tax exceeds their toll, a majority of the farmers are benefitted.

In this county this year $11,000 was expended on pikes, and they are improving every year. It is undoubtedly an issue in favor of the common people, which is Bryan democracy.

Boone has the advantage of this county in regard to metal. Limestone rock has to be quarried here. It is from 3 to 10 feet thick, while Boone has plenty of stone and gravel, therefore pikes can be kept up cheaper than those here in Lincoln. Limestone put on the road costs the county $9 50 per rod of 225 feet. This is the highest. It costs less according to convenience.

With this meager statement of the condition of the pikes in Lincoln county, I say to my friends in Boone county, vote for free turnpikes. They will enhance the value of farms all over the county a great deal more than the tax will amount to, and in a few years you will have the best roads you ever had. We have—why not Boone?

"Lowtax" says that free turnpikes are forerunners of oppression, free railroads and free transportation, Cite me to a county that is oppressed by free pikes, and I will show you hens' teeth. Lincoln, Boyle, Jessamine, Garrard, and nearly all the prosperous counties have free pikes, and in them real estate is advancing every year, and the roads are getting better, while their population is increasing. How is it in Boone? If the people listen to "Lowtax" they surely will be in the background and will be oppressed by the slang he uses. But the honest yeomanry is not going to listen to such 15th century twaddle. He says improvement is not the question. Are you willing to impose a tax on yourself for the benefit of others? He wants Boone to stay in the old ruts until all the counties around her free their roads, when he can impose on them by riding in his ox cart over their free pikes.

Let old Boone come to the front as she worthily deserves, and stand side by side with other counties by voting free pikes.

ONE OF THE FISCAL COURT.

NOTICE.

I have read from a paper that I have in my office, dated October 2, 1905, that the combine of Hamilton county, Ohio, held up the tax-payers over there for $40,000 in the purchase of six turnpikes. This is progress in Ohio, carried on by enlightened people. If enlightenment leads to such depredations as that, it would be better to go back to the fourteenth century. But don't forget that laws have loopholes in them as well as do trades. The difference is the hole in the law is to jump in and collect all the tax that it is possible, as it seems by fraud and law.

The turnpike law requires 25 cents on the $100 to maintain them. This would be about $16,000 per year in Boone county. As some of the free turnpikes advocates have acknowledged that there will be graft, leakage, salaries and commissions, which is likely to leave $7,000 or $8,000, which would not any more than keep up the pikes already built. If there are as many more built it will take as much more to keep them in repair. Then you have 50 cents on the $100 to pay. Now, you ask, "how can they collect more than the law has stated?" Don't forget the loop-hole. There are many ways. The tax valuation of your property can be raised one-third or more—if one third then you have 58⅓ cents on the $100, and then there will be the dirt roads to keep in repair, for which 10 cents on the $100 is collected, which will bring the road tax up to 68⅓ cents. Now add your part of the interest on $200,000 of bonds, and if you are a road worker add 4 or 5 days work, or its equivalent $4 or $5 to the amount of tax you would pay, then you will have about the amount you will pay under the free turnpike and dirt road system.

As to what the toll pikes would cost the county can only be judged by what has been paid for others, and as a majority of the Democratic leaders seem to cut their cloth by [illegible] Indiana patterns, one would judge that they will cost from $2,000 to $3,000 per mile. Don't forget, a bonded debt which is likely to increase, must be paid some time over and above all other expenses. Without experience there is no telling the amount of tax you will have to pay under a free turnpike and dirt road system.

Notes About Sheep.

Poor sheep in cold weather is a hard proposition. Fatten them now.

Even fibre in the fleece means even and regular feeding or food.

Mutton has become as great a factor in sheep husbandry as wool, on account of increased consumption of it.

The shepherd who has a lot of good fat sheep each winter, will find his feeding pays quite as well as the average.

Not only does it cost less to make a pound of young flesh than it does a pound of mature flesh, but the former is worth more in market.

Only the very best sheep, animals which are true to their specific varieties of breeds and full of promise, should be selected for breeding purposes.

If there are any sick or unthrifty sheep in the flock, separate them and if possible, market them in some way. It will not pay to winter them.

With the sheep selected for breeding, the natural growth and character of the wool of the animals to be mated should be a matter of first class importance.

Valuable as blood is in breeding, it has a very necessary adjunct and that is, individual merit. Pedigree is of little value in itself unless backed by individual merit.

The best interests of sheep husbandry does not so much call for extraordinary weights as they do for the production of muttons of moderate weight and choice quality.

Sheep increase so rapidly and mature at such an early age and their flesh is so wholesome for food that on the majority of farms a flock can readily be made profitable.

In buying sheep to feed this winter, buy good ones. The value of the feed is the same whether fed to good sheep or poor ones; the difference in the profits will be with the former.

However well grounded the position of the wool grower may be at any time, he is short sighted if he neglect to look after the mutton side of the business. But at the same time, he should not neglect the quality of wool and the interests of wool production.

Bob Burdette, besides being a humorist of the highest class, was a philosopher. Listen to his advice to young men: "Remember my son, you have to work. Whether you handle the pick or pen, or wheelbarrow, or a set of books, digging ditches or editing a newspaper, ringing an auction bell or writing funny things, you must work. Don't be afraid of killing yourself by overworking on the sunny side of thirty. Men die sometimes, but it is because they quit at 6 p. m., and don't get home till 2 a. m. It's the interval that kills my son. The work gives you appetite for your meals; it lends solidity to your slumber; it gives you a perfect and grateful appreciation of a holiday. There are young men who do not work, but the country is not proud of them. It does not know their names even; it only speaks of them as "old-so-and-so's boys." No body likes them; the great, busy world doesn't know that they are here. So find out what you want to be and do, take off your coat and make dust in the world. The busier you are the less harm you are apt to get into, the sweeter will be your sleep, the brighter and happier your holidays, and the better satisfied the world will be with you.

A hog in Missouri was in the habit of feeding under the cars loaded with grain, and, one day, as usual, it was under a car when the train started, and it caught it and cut off a leg. Some boys came across the crippled hog and dressed the wound and watched it until the stub healed, when they got a piece of rubber hose, sewed the bottom together and filled it with sawdust. They then attached the hose to the stump, and the hog can now be seen running about the cars at Malden as lively as ever. This story is worthy of record for two reasons: First, as showing boys doing the Good Samaritan act, when their usual role is that of the cruel Philistine. Secondly, their rude but ingenious surgery, indicating that there is the making of a good doctor in that crowd.

Man's Unreasonableness

is often as great as woman's. But Thos. A. Austin, Mgr. of the "Republican," of Leavenworth, Ind., was not unreasonable, when he refused to allow the doctors to operate on his wife, for female trouble, "Instead," he says, "we concluded to try Electric Bitters. My wife was then so sick, she could hardly leave her bed, and five (5) physicians had failed to relieve her. After taking Electric Bitters, she was perfectly cured, and can now perform all her household duties." Guaranteed by all druggists, price 50c.

Henry Conner raised five potatoes that measured 36 in. in length when laid end to end, and two of them weighed 44 ounces. They were undoubtedly Irish potatoes—they were "Maggie Murphy's."

Col. Thomas Grimsley, of Hamilton, reports a very singular and unusual incident from his section. A boat coming up stream opposite the town met a drove of geese going down stream—the pilot threw a powerful light on the geese and just like geese, they became confused, flew into and all over the boat. The pilot "let go the wheel and let 'er float" and caught several geese. This is no fish story.

If all accounts of the reception accorded Grangers in Covington, last week, he what they seem, then every Granger there should have, during life, a tender place in their hearts for Elks and all concerned and with the poet exclaim, "Let the goddess of friendship with her pen dipped in the sunlight of a beautiful inspiration trace in letters of gold on every leaf in the book of our memory, kind thoughts of these."

The writer, in company with James Gaison, made a flying trip to Kenton county via Walton grade to David Hick's and thence to California; thence to McCullom farm 4 miles east; after leaving the Lexington pike we traveled through mud for 1½ miles and came to a beautiful graded and macadamized road leading to Independence, Covington and other points in the county. At noon we drew up to the hospitable home of Lucien Coleman where old-fashioned Kentucky hospitality is dispensed with all of its characteristic courtesy and kindness. Later we left for California via the California and Covington road—a road even broader, better graded than the DeCoursey creek road. Arriving at C. we were kindly entertained by Mr. Rankin, who told us how prosperous the people of Kenton county were and how well pleased they are with conditions generally. We quote him ver batim in saying, "every farm offered for sale in Kenton county by some man (who never did and never can make any money farming) is immediately bought by some man who can and does do it." At 7:30 p. m. we were safely landed in Union all ok. It's good to travel.

The event that is now being looked forward to by our entire population, is the old fashioned spelling school that is to come off on the night of the 10th inst. at the school house, under the supervision of Prof. Elbert Ryle. That this occasion may be the more interesting and profitable, Pro. Ryle, besides the general public, invites the Bullittsburg, Bullittsville, Francesville, Riddell and Limaburg schools to attend and participate in the exercises. What is a laugh and a pleasant smile worth? Their worth cannot be estimated. A laugh and pleasant smile is worth more than all the groans. At present everything is quiet in the Hathaway gold fields, but as the matter of developing them is in the hands of several large capitalists, who are attending to all the preliminaries, the call for hands to begin work may come at any time. Those who are taking the lead in the matter are growing more sanguine that the precious yellow metal in paying quantities will soon be taken from the hills around about this hamlet. In the next few days the organization of the developing company will be completed, and then you may expect some very encouraging reports from here. Oil, gas and gold, all here in a bunch, as it were, are expected to make things exceedingly lively hereabouts in the near future.

We have read, with much interest, the numerous articles on free turnpikes, and, it is our opinion, that the free pikers have much the best of the arguments. J. E. Hall and "Lowtax" had better go away off and get into some secluded place before the wheels of progress roll over them.

Those who had made their calculations to finish gathering corn on the last day of October had their plans knocked out by the change in the weather.

Don't go hunting, yet boys. It is better to delay sport two weeks than to have to pay a fine and cost amounting to $10 or $15. Quails and rabbits will not spoil before the 15th inst.

Beemon, a sweet potato, which, upon, first sight, resembles a duck when on the water, but when examined closely that part which would represent a duck's head is found to be a perfect immage of a mouse, in an exact position a mouse would occupy if eating of the potato. The tail of the mouse is represented perfectly, while Mr. Rouse or someone else, supplied the eyes with two, small black beads. It is certainly a curiosity.

A LESSON IN MANUAL TRAINING

PRACTICAL POINTS FOR BOYS WITH AMBITION AND GENIUS.

Construction of a Set of Floor Shelves in Modern Mission Style—A Table Book-Rack with Hinged Ends.

BY JAMES RITCHEY.
(Instructor in Wood-Working and Pattern-Making, Armour Institute of Technology, Chicago.)
(Copyright, 1905, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

In Fig. 129 we gave a pleasing illustration, from an artistic point of view, of the advantage of breaking up the conventional straight lines in the hanging book shelves, and in like manner Fig. 145 illustrates the same principle applied to a set of floor shelves, not only greatly improving their appearance, as compared with Fig. 124, but also adding to their convenience in the arrangement of books of different sizes on the upper shelves.

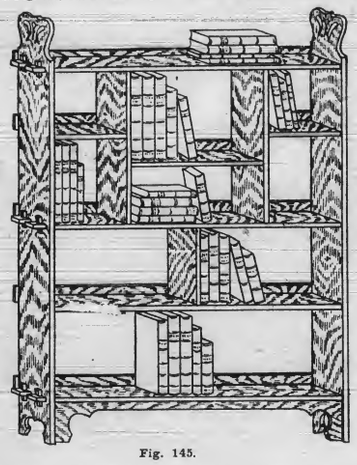

Fig. 145.

The construction is in modern Mission style, that is, the upper, middle and lower shelves are mortised through the sides and keyed, as shown in Fig. 145. All the remaining shelves, and also the three upright partitions, are doweled in the middle opening, after which the remaining wood is easily removed with either a compass or how saw. At B in the same figure an end of one of the shelves is given, with length and width of tenons.

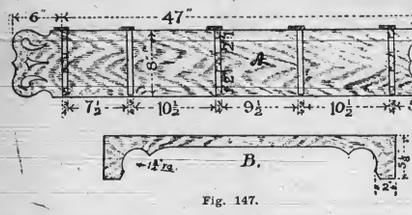

Fig. 147.

In Fig. 149 is illustrated the way in which the hand screws are placed, which must be used when gluing and clamping the manner explained under Figs. 116 and 117, five or six dowels five-sixteenths inch in diameter being used in each connection.

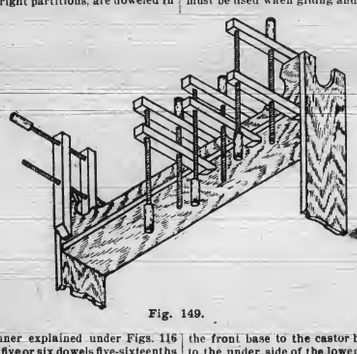

Fig. 149.

In Fig. 146 the plan for the front is shown, including dimensions and distances. At A in Fig 147 is seen the design and details for the sides, and at B a design for the base, which is glued under the front edge of the lower shelf.

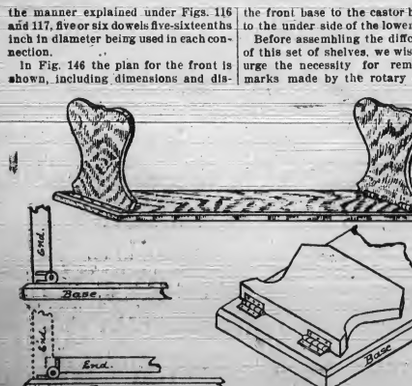

Fig. 150.

In Fig. 148 at A an enlarged illustration is given of the upper end of the sides, with the lengths of the radii for the different curves, and here again the design should be drawn on heavy drawing paper or cardboard, which, when cut out, can be used as a pattern with which to mark out the sides. The upper ends of the two curved openings are seven-eighths inch in diameter and may be bored out with a seven-eighths inch center bit, also a hole of the same size and is so fully illustrated by the drawings as to need no further description.

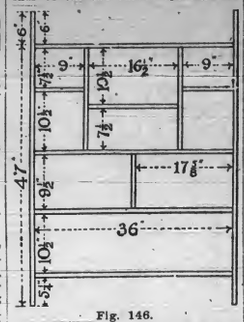

Fig. 146.

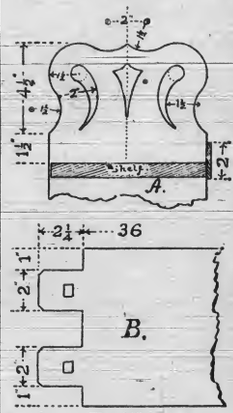

Fig. 148.

The stock list for the design shown in Fig. 145 will be as follows:

2 pieces 55x5x⅝—Sides.
3 pieces 40½x7⅛x⅝—Shelves with tenons.
1 piece 36x7⅛x⅝—Shelf, doweled.
2 pieces 55x7⅛x⅝—Shelves, doweled.
1 piece 16½x7⅛x⅝—Shelf, doweled.
2 pieces 13⅜x7⅛x⅝—Upright partitions, doweled.
1 piece 8¼x7⅛x⅝—Upright partitions, doweled.
1 piece 38x2x⅝-16 or ¼—Ledges on back of shelves.
1 piece 40x2x⅝-16 or ¼—Ledges for 3 short shelves.
4 pieces 5¼x1½x1½—Castor blocks.

The table book rack illustrated in Fig. 150 differs from the one given in Fig. 128 only in having the ends hinged

The stock list will be as follows:

1 piece 16x6x⅝—Base.
2 pieces 6x6x⅝—Ends.

TURTLE TRADING VESSEL.

Small Schooner That Handles Catch of Canadian Marshes Each Season.

A more or less regular visitor at the port of Erie each season is the schooner Bertha Wallace, Capt. A. Winne. She is only 35 feet over all and 11 feet beam, and hails from Port Clinton, Canada, says Forest and Stream. Her only cargo is of turtles, that are carried in a squirming mass down in the hold. She made her first voyage for this season a week ago, being later this year than usual, as the turtles are rather scarce yet. Capt. Winne says, but he expects to do better from this out. He only had 2,800 pounds this time.

These turtles are caught in traps set in a marsh behind Long Point, Canada, nearly opposite Erie. The traps are much like fish nets and are baited with fish. Capt. Winne has often as many as 60 traps set. They have to be watched as carefully as an animal trap. The captain has been in the business now for 25 years; he is a full cousin of Postmaster General Wynne, though he spells his name differently.

The turtles he brought over this time would not average more than nine pounds each, though a few of them weighed 20 pounds. The largest one he ever brought here weighed 60 pounds. It was kept in Erie to furnish soup for the patrons of one of the hotels.

These turtles when they arrive here are turned over to a fish company, which ships them all over the country, a good many of them going to a company in Ohio, which then ships them east.

To unload the turtles a man gets down among them in the hold, then seizing each one by its tail, never by its head, he gives it a quick fling that lands it always on its back on the dock; here another man taking a new tail hold, throws it into a box, which when it is full is nailed up and shipped right off.

There is no duty to be paid on these turtles; they seem to have been forgotten when the last tariff was made up. They are not even protected here in the United States, at least not in this state, though the frogs are.

Sleepless Fish.

There are several species of fish, reptiles and insects which never sleep during the whole of their existence. Among fish it is positively known that pike, salmon and goldfish never sleep at all; also that there are several others in the fish family that never sleep more than a few minutes a month. There are dozens of species of flies which never indulge in slumber, and from three to five species of serpents which also never sleep.

Historic Sapling.

The interesting sapling from Shakespeare's garden at Stratford-on-Avon, presented by the mayor to Southwark, and planted in front of the town hall, last autumn, has not Walworth road, last autumn, has not survived the transplantation, and has lately been removed. It was an offshoot of the famous mulberry tree and was intended to commemorate the Shakespearean connection between Southwark and Stratford-on-Avon.

TRUST TAX AND TARIFF.

Republican Participants in Plunder Refuse to Move for Revision.

There is a set phrase used by the republicans that: "The tariff must be revised by its friends." Now the friends of the tariff do not want revision, therefore, how can the tariff be revised by its friends? Senator Gallinger, of New Hampshire, a republican leader, said a few days ago: "I do not propose to be a partner to opening the Pandora box that attempts at tariff revision and unquestionably precipitate." The evils that are feared if the tariff box is opened are, no doubt, most serious when viewed from the standpoint of republican politicians. They are silent partners with the trusts, that the tariff fosters, in taxing the people and would have a sorry time in running their political machines without the contributions from the protected few, mainly trust magnates.

But side by side with the evils that would arise to the few from opening the tariff box, there would also be vast advantages to the many, depending in its volume upon the thoroughness with which the revision of the tariff is made.

If the tariff rate on trust products was reduced to the point where it would produce revenue to the government, instead of, as now, producing revenue for the trusts also, there would be a large saving to every family in the cost of living. The government now collects on the average $3.49 each year from every man, woman and child for tariff tax, so that an average family of five persons pays $17.45.

But that is only a small part of the tax that is imposed by the tariff, for the trusts and others protected, are enabled to add to the price they charge for their products more than a reasonable profit would allow, so that it is estimated that when the government collects $3.49 per capita of tariff tax, the trusts and other tariff beneficiaries collect not less than $12.50 per capita and probably much above that large amount, in increased prices that the tariff protects them in charging.

So the tariff bill which the American people pay each year is: To the government $280,000,000 or $3.49 per capita; to the trusts $1,000,000,000 or $12.50 per capita; total $1,280,000,000, or $15.99 per capita.

The annual tariff tax therefore to each family of five persons is not less than $79.95.

How much the republican politicians get of the tariff tax collected by the trusts is not possible to arrive at, for these contributions are made secretly, and, as the late exposures in the life insurance scandals show, are charged up as "legal expenses." That millions have been paid to republican campaign managers by corporations and individuals, nearly all of whom are directly or indirectly interested in the trusts, and therefore in maintaining the tariff tax intact, is not denied by those like Mr. Cortelyou, the chairman of the national republican committee, and Mr. Babcock, the chairman of the republican congressional committee. The people pay the tariff tax and the trust-controlled republican leaders refuse to revise the tariff, which furnishes the means for controlling elections.

If this tariff tax was collected at the door of the stores by collectors for the government, the trusts and the republican politicians, the customers would rebel and demand that their representatives in congress revise the obnoxious law. But the politicians are too smart to fix the tariff law to be collected in that direct way and have adroitly arranged the tax so that it is paid indirectly in the increased cost of the goods you purchase.

Still, you who are voters have a remedy by voting only for candidates for congress who are pledged to revise the tariff and for members of the legislature who will vote for United States senators who are also pledged to tariff reform. Those who are not voters—wives, mothers and sisters—can use their influence on husbands, fathers and brothers, to vote for tariff revision and to accomplish that you will find it necessary to support the democratic candidates, for no other will unreservedly pledge himself to reduce the tariff tax to the needs of the government honestly and economically administered.

Shaw Roams at Will.

President Roosevelt has decided that members of the cabinet can only speak in their own states at the fall election, except Secretary Shaw—and here is the funny feature of the administration hippodrome. The cabinet members are not to interfere in the state fights, but Shaw, the clown of the circus, can get off his jokes anywhere and everywhere that people will hear him. Is Secretary Shaw considered so harmless that he is allowed to roam at will, or so hurtful to the anti-administration faction that his stand-pat tariff talk and known pro-railroad proclivities is expected to defeat them? From appearances, the republican machine in Ohio is so weighed down with Coxism and bossism that not even the frothing of Shaw can hurt it more than it has already been injured.

——As a campaign cry, free coal sounds well, but means nothing. It is useless to look to the tariff for the remedy. Massachusetts will get cheaper coal when the coal trust reforms and not until then.—Springfield Union.

——In noting the return from Europe of Dr. Howard of the department of agriculture, "where he secured a large number of parasites," the Washington Post (Ind.) says pertinently that it was under the impression that the departments "were already overstocked in that line."

POLITICIANS BESMIRCHED.

Fat-Frying Is the Principal Occupation of the Republican Leaders.

It now appears that the republican congressional committee was another grafter on the life insurance companies and Chairman Babcock was the solicitor and recipient of the contributions from the funds that should have been sacred to the widows and orphans. Mr. Thummel, lobbyist for the Mutual Life, admitted in his evidence before the investigating committee that he paid Mr. Babcock $2,500 in cash before the last election. The legislative attorneys of the other insurance companies have not yet testified on this point, but no doubt Mr. Babcock squeezed them all alike. What object the Mutual Life Insurance company had in making this contribution to elect a republican congress is left mostly to conjecture, but an inkling is given that it was to influence the republican members of congress, especially Mr. Babcock himself, who was chairman of the committee on the District of Columbia, to refrain from legislating for the protection of the policy holders of the district and of the territories.

Was this money contributed to Mr. Babcock for his own use, or to the general committee fund for the election of republican congressmen? When the time comes for investigating political contributions Mr. Babcock's evidence on this point will be interesting. The success of Mr. Babcock in "frying the fat" out of corporations, who in return expected to be immune from hostile legislation or recipients of congressional favors in railroad trust and tariff legislation, has, no doubt, been his chief recommendation to his republican associates. But there are indications that the life insurance scandals and other threatened exposures when congress meets will necessitate the selection of a new "fat fryer" for the republican congressional committee. It may be said, however, in Mr. Babcock's favor that Mr. Cortelyou still holds on as chairman of the republican national committee, although he has been tarred with the same brush that has besmirched Mr. Babcock.

There will have to be a thorough job of whitewash for some of the republican leaders, or they will all have to retire for "the good of the party."
